An Australian Consumer Law

Fair markets — Confident consumers

17 February 2009
FOREWORD

Consumers are key to ensuring the ongoing robustness of Australia’s economy. Empowered consumers drive competition and encourage innovation and choice.

In May 2008 the Ministerial Council on Consumer Affairs welcomed the publication of the Productivity Commission’s Review of Australia’s Consumer Policy Framework, which provided a much needed analysis of Australia’s existing consumer policy framework and considered recommendations for reform.

COAG’s 2 October 2008 agreement to introduce a national consumer law implements recommendations by the Commission and follows on from the detailed policy proposals that we agreed at the Ministerial Council on Consumer Affairs in August 2008 to enable these recommendations to be practically implemented.

An Australian Consumer Law will significantly enhance consumer protection, reduce regulatory complexity for businesses and encourage the development of a seamless national economy. Greater enforcement cooperation will mean that consumers will benefit from these laws through consistent national approaches to consumer problems.

The reforms have three key elements:

- the development of a consumer law to be applied both nationally and in each State and Territory, which is based on the existing consumer protection provisions of the Trade Practices Act 1974, and which includes a new national provision regulating unfair contract terms, new enforcement powers and, where agreed, changes based on best practice in state and territory laws;

- the implementation of a new national product safety regulatory and enforcement framework, as part of the national consumer law; and

- the development of enhanced enforcement cooperation and information sharing mechanisms between national and state and territory regulatory agencies.

To assist the Ministerial Council in implementing these reforms, I am pleased to release this information and consultation paper as an important step in the reform process to develop a new national consumer law for Australia.
This paper, which has been developed by the Standing Committee of Officials of Consumer Affairs (made up of officials from all Australian governments), sets out further detail on COAG’s agreed reforms, legislative proposals and suggested reforms.

I welcome the views of all those interested in, and concerned with, consumer policy in Australia.

The Hon Chris Bowen MP
Assistant Treasurer, Minister for Competition Policy and Consumer Affairs

SUMMARY

In 2007-2008 the Productivity Commission reviewed Australia’s consumer policy framework. The PC concluded that ‘while Australia’s consumer policy framework has considerable strengths, parts of it require an overhaul.’ On 2 October 2008, all Australian governments agreed to a new consumer policy framework, comprising a single national consumer law and streamlined enforcement arrangements.

The new national consumer policy framework will involve the following key elements:

- A new national consumer law, which will be called the Australian Consumer Law, and which is implemented as part of an application law scheme with the Australian Government as the lead legislator and other jurisdictions to apply the national consumer law as part of their own laws.

- The national consumer law will be based on the existing consumer protection provisions of the TPA.

- As recommended by the PC, the national consumer law will also include:
  - a provision which regulates unfair terms in consumer contracts;
  - new enforcement powers which will enable more proportionate responses to consumer law breaches and new redress options for consumers; and
  - a new national legislative and regulatory regime for product safety.

- Where it is generally agreed that the current provisions of the TPA are inadequate, the Australian Consumer Law should include provisions which modify and augment the existing generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA, which are based on best practice in state and territory consumer laws.

- There will be an Inter-Governmental Agreement between the Australian Government and the governments of the States and Territories concerning the process for amending the national consumer law and the administrative architecture underpinning it.

- Consumer regulators will develop improved enforcement cooperation and information sharing arrangements.

The purpose of this information and consultation paper is to:

- explain how the national consumer law will be developed;

- explain the nature and scope of COAG’s agreed reforms to create the national consumer law and, in some limited circumstances, seek views on specific aspects of those reforms; and seek views and explore options for augmentations and modifications to existing generic consumer protections which are based on best practice in existing state and territory laws.

Going forward, SCOCA will seek views on the draft provisions of the Australian Consumer Law, as they are made ready. To facilitate this, the paper is divided into four parts, covering:

- the context of the reforms (Part I);

- COAG’s agreed consumer law reforms, including the establishment of a national consumer law (based on the TPA), unfair contract terms regulation, a national product safety regulatory regime and new enforcement powers and redress (Part II);

- suggested reforms based on best practice in existing state and territory laws (Part III); and

- implementation and review (Part IV).
Part I
Context
CHAPTER 1
BACKGROUND TO THE REFORMS

The Productivity Commission’s review of Australia’s consumer policy framework

On 11 December 2006 the Productivity Commission (PC) commenced an inquiry into Australia’s consumer policy framework. The PC was asked to report on ways to improve the coordination of consumer policy development, the harmonisation of consumer laws and their administration across jurisdictions in Australia, and the removal of regulatory duplication and inconsistency. The PC presented its final report to the Government on 30 April 2008, and it was tabled in the Australian Parliament and published on 8 May 2008.

During the course of its work, the PC received 262 written submissions from national, state and territory government bodies, businesses, consumer representatives and the public, and conducted two rounds of public hearings in Sydney, Melbourne and Canberra. It also published a draft report in December 2007.2 Submissions were received and public hearings conducted following the publication of the draft report, which the PC took into account when producing its final report and recommendations.3

In relation to a national consumer law, the PC specifically recommended that:4

- Australian governments should implement a new national consumer law, based on the consumer provisions in the Trade Practices Act 1974 (TPA). The new law could be augmented in areas where the TPA does not provide adequate protection in particular generic issues and incorporate certain provisions from the state and territory Fair Trading Acts (FTAs), where it is generally agreed that the TPA is not adequate.

- The new law should apply to all consumer transactions, including financial services, with the Australian Securities and Investments Commission (ASIC) retaining its role as the primary regulator for financial services.

- Unnecessary or divergent sector-specific laws should be identified with a view to repealing or harmonising them across jurisdictions where possible.

- A provision should be incorporated into the new law that addresses unfair contract terms. The PC’s preferred approach was that the provision would relate only to standard form contracts, exclude up-front prices from consideration and require all circumstances of the contract to be considered. A term would be unfair when it causes significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations and would, if exercised, results in material detriment to consumers.

4 PC 2008 Recs. 4.1, 4.2, 4.3, 4.4, 4.5, 5.1, 7.1, 9.5 and 10.1. The remainder of the PC’s recommendations are set out in its Final Report.
• Responsibility for enforcing the consumer product safety provisions of the new law in all jurisdictions should be transferred to the Australian Government and undertaken by the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC).

• The remainder of the new law should be jointly enforced by the ACCC and state and territory consumer regulators. Individual States and Territories should have the option of referring their enforcement powers for all of the new law to the Australian Government with enforcement undertaken by the ACCC.

• New enforcement powers and remedies, including civil pecuniary penalties, disqualification orders, substantiation notices, infringement notices, public warning (‘naming and shaming’) powers and redress for non-parties.

• The new enforcement arrangements should be independently reviewed, with explicit consideration of the costs and benefits given to the case of moving towards a single national regulator model. A single national consumer regulator should be considered if the review finds evidence of differing enforcement practices or divergence of jurisdictional regulation.

COAG’s reform process

On 26 March 2008 the Council of Australian Governments (COAG) agreed that the Business Regulation and Competition Working Group (BRCWG), in consultation with the Ministerial Council on Consumer Affairs (MCCA), would develop an enhanced consumer policy framework, including legislative and regulatory structures, drawing on the final report of the PC.

On 23 May 2008 MCCA agreed to develop detailed policy proposals for implementing the PC’s recommendations. MCCA then developed a series of detailed reform proposals designed to respond to the PC’s report, which it agreed on 15 August 2008, along with an indicative implementation plan. These are set out in MCCA’s Communiqué (see Attachment A). MCCA then submitted these proposals to the BRCWG, prior to the BRCWG recommending these to COAG for agreement on 2 October 2008.

On 2 October 2008 COAG agreed:

‘to a new consumer policy framework comprising a single national consumer law based on the Trade Practices Act 1974, drawing on the recommendations of the Productivity Commission and best practice in State and Territory consumer laws, including a provision regulating unfair contract terms.

‘The new national consumer law will deliver on COAG’s commitment to a seamless national economy by providing a uniform and higher level of protection for Australian consumers and addressing weaknesses in existing laws. The new policy framework will improve consumer law enforcement powers, reduce compliance costs for business and increase access to information regarding dispute resolution and consumer issues.

‘The Productivity Commission has estimated the economic benefits of the framework at between $1.5 billion and $4.5 billion a year.’

CHAPTER 2
AN AUSTRALIAN CONSUMER LAW

Why does Australia need a new national consumer law?

Australia’s consumer laws are adequate, but could be better

In its review of Australia’s consumer policy framework, the PC concluded that ‘[w]hile Australia’s consumer policy framework has considerable strengths, parts of it require an overhaul.’ The PC went on to say that ‘[i]n a number of respects, Australia’s current consumer policy framework … is sound. In particular, without excessive prescription, the generic regulatory regime operating through the TPA and FTAs provides a broad platform for consumer protection for most products and services.’

The PC’s conclusion forms the basis of the approach adopted by COAG in agreeing to reform Australia’s consumer laws. When formulating the detailed proposals for reform MCCA stated that ‘[i]n proposing these reforms, MCCA recognises that while Australia’s current consumer policy framework has strengths, it is in need of significant improvements to overcome existing inconsistencies, gaps and duplication in Australia’s consumer legislation and its enforcement.’

With this in mind, COAG’s agreed reforms and the suggested reforms set out in this paper are intended to build on and improve the current generic consumer protections set out in the TPA, which are also reflected, in large part, in state and territory FTAs. In this way, the reforms mark an evolution of Australia’s consumer laws to a form which guarantees national consistency in key areas.

Developing national product and service markets need a national approach to regulation

Australia’s consumer product and service markets are becoming increasingly national in character. In 2007 around 48 per cent of goods and services, measured by turnover, were supplied by firms operating nationally. Since 1998, the number of retail businesses operating nationally has increased from 47 per cent to 53 per cent and, since 2003, there has been a 70 per cent increase in the number of firms that operate in every State and Territory.

Innovations in supply chain management, enabled by the greater use of information technology and better transport infrastructure, have led to an expansion in nationally-focused businesses that supply a range of goods and services to consumers across Australia. Internet technology has also seen the increase of consumers buying goods or services across jurisdictions. The NSW Office of Fair Trading estimates the percentage of adult Australians ordering or purchasing online is above 50 per cent.\(^{10}\) The increasing pace of change in many of these markets, fuelled by technological change, means that detriment for consumers from unresponsive policy making will also escalate.\(^{11}\)

The trend towards national consumer markets means that consumers will, despite purchasing the same products from the same businesses, receive different levels of protection. Furthermore, the burden imposed by divergent and complex regulatory requirements will grow for businesses, and by acting now to reduce complexity and divergence, these reforms will make a significant contribution to the development of a seamless national economy.

Australian consumers deserve consistent protection, wherever they live

While there is a high degree of commonality in Australia’s various generic consumer protections at the national and state levels, there remains variation in consumer protection legislation, policy approaches, enforcement intensity and practices and redress options between all Australian jurisdictions. COAG’s agreed reforms are designed to overcome many of these problems.

Australian consumers have differing protections and redress options depending on where they live or where they make purchases. These differences provide inconsistent signals to consumers about their rights and responsibilities and also mean that they can be treated inconsistently in relation to the same types of consumer protection issues.

The development of e-commerce and resulting increase in cross-border transactions raises concerns in relation to application of divergent national, state and territory consumer protections to issues that have a cross-border or national dimension.

Business compliance costs are increased by the need for suppliers to comply with multiple regulatory regimes, and to operate in even slightly divergent regulatory regimes. Even where there are no actual differences in regulation, suppliers can still incur legal costs to ascertain their obligations across jurisdictions.\(^{12}\) These costs are passed onto consumers in the form of higher prices.

More effective responses to consumer issues through better policy making processes

Consumers face rapidly changing markets, increased reliance on technology and a faster pace of innovation, all of which pose a significant challenge in ensuring regulation can keep pace. Any potential for complexity and duplication in policy making serves to impede the ability of regulation to keep pace with change. COAG’s agreement to develop national generic consumer laws provides Australian governments with an opportunity to streamline policy making procedures, and overcome issues that may have served to delay effective responses to issues in the past.

An application law scheme

The Australian Consumer Law will be enacted both nationally and in each of the States and Territories by means of an application law scheme.

The application law model

Under an application law scheme, one jurisdiction acts as the lead legislator, passing the law that applies in its own jurisdiction, along with a schedule version for application in other jurisdictions. The other jurisdictions then apply that schedule version in their own laws. Amendments to the national law would then require agreement by jurisdictions according to an Inter-Governmental Agreement. In this way, consistency is maintained, without the need for a formal referral of powers under section 51(xxxvii) of the Australian Constitution.13

The use of an application law model would not preclude an individual jurisdiction referring all or part of its consumer law and/or enforcement powers to the Commonwealth at a future date.

Given the dual national/jurisdictional dimension of consumer regulation in Australia, the law will be legislated by the Australian Parliament, and each State and Territory will apply the nationally agreed law.

The PC recommended that a national consumer law should be based on the existing consumer protection provisions of the TPA, with amendments to reflect the PC’s other recommendations. Where there is general agreement that an issue is not adequately dealt with by the TPA, provisions should be included based on best practice in state and territory laws.14 Minor variations in legislation at the jurisdictional level may be required to ensure that the new law extends to non-corporate entities and reflects differing judicial arrangements among the States and Territories. There will also be a need for protocols or mechanisms to specify the basis for reviewing or making changes to the law.

An application law model would also allow New Zealand, which is a member of MCCA and party to the Closer Economic Relations Trade Agreement (and as such committed to greater commonality of regulation with Australia), to adopt in a fairly straightforward way aspects of the application law, should it decide to do so.15

The form of the legislation

The Australian Consumer Law will consist of common provisions which set out agreed generic consumer protections that will apply to all Australian consumers and across all Australian jurisdictions. The Law will also include supporting provisions that create:

- common definitions of key terms;
- common enforcement powers for use by all consumer regulators; and

- common consumer remedies in respect of breaches of the Law.

At the national level, the Australian Consumer Law will be a schedule to Australia’s main market regulation law, the TPA, which reflects the mutually reinforcing nature of consumer and competition regulation. As an application law, it will be reflected in the provisions of the TPA, and also applied by each State and Territory as part of their own laws.

Australia’s governments will implement the Australian Consumer Law in the following way:

- the Australian Parliament will:
  - in accordance with the agreed text of the Australian Consumer Law, amend the consumer protection and related provisions of the TPA relating to consumer protection, and also include new provisions providing an administrative underpinning for the Australian Consumer Law;
  - enact a version of the Australian Consumer Law as a schedule to the TPA, which includes modifications to take account of the way in which state laws apply to individuals and non-incorporated entities and which takes account of specific administrative and enforcement issues;
  - enact changes to the investor protection provisions of the ASIC Act and, to the extent necessary, the Corporations Act 2001 which reflect the Australian Consumer Law, with any necessary modifications; and

- each State and Territory Parliament will then pass an application Act which will apply the schedule version of the Australian Consumer Law in their jurisdictions and amend or repeal any state and territory legislation affected by or superseded by the new Law.

Amendments to the Australian Consumer Law will be made according to the process set out in the Inter-Governmental Agreement, which will cover proposals for changes to the Law, consultation on those proposals and decision making. Any change to the Australian Consumer Law will require the agreement of the Australian Government, plus the governments of four other jurisdictions, three of which must be States. Once a change has been agreed, then the Australian Government will introduce legislation into the Australian Parliament to amend the schedule version of the Australian Consumer Law accordingly, as well as making corresponding changes to the TPA.16

The objectives of the Australian Consumer Law

The PC, in its report, recommended that Australian governments adopt a new policy objective for consumer issues, which was modified in MCCA’s detailed proposals to COAG. The objective, as agreed by MCCA on 15 August 2008, is as follows:

‘To improve consumer wellbeing through consumer empowerment and protection, fostering effective competition and enabling the confident participation of consumers in markets in which both consumers and suppliers trade fairly.’

16 This approach is similar to the model used in relation to the Competition Code in the TPA, under which the national law is contained in a schedule to the TPA and applied in each State and Territory.
This overarching objective is supported by six operational objectives for consumer policy:

- to ensure that consumers are sufficiently well informed to benefit from and stimulate effective competition;
- to ensure that goods and services are safe and fit for the purposes for which they were sold;
- to prevent practices that are unfair;
- to meet the needs of those consumers who are most vulnerable or are at the greatest disadvantage;
- to provide accessible and timely redress where consumer detriment has occurred; and
- to promote proportionate, risk-based enforcement.

In agreeing to this policy objective, MCCA did not propose that it be a statutory objective for the Australian Consumer Law but for broader policy development. However, including an overarching statutory objective in the Australian Consumer Law would assist in guiding the reader’s understanding of the legislation and its intent and also aid judicial interpretation.

SCOCA suggests that the Australian Consumer Law could have the following objective:

’The object of this Law is to enhance the welfare of Australians through the promotion of competition and fair trading, and the empowerment and protection of consumers.’

This proposed objective reflects the existing objective of the TPA with some modification, reflecting the concern of MCCA for both the empowerment and protection of consumers.

Implementing the Australian Consumer Law

Implementation timeline

The timeline for the implementation of these reforms is as follows:

- by 30 June 2009: finalisation of the Inter-Governmental Agreement (covering the Australian Consumer Law and including product safety);
- by 30 June 2010: finalisation and agreement of the text of the legislation for the Australian Consumer Law, including the product safety reforms; and
- by 31 December 2010:
  - the Australian Parliament is to have passed legislation for the Australian Consumer Law (including product safety) and amend the TPA;
  - the Parliaments of the States and Territories are to have passed application Acts to apply the Australian Consumer Law (including product safety) in their own jurisdictions; and commencement of the Australian Consumer Law in all Australian jurisdictions.

The implementation process

The Australian Consumer Law will be implemented under the auspices of MCCA, which in turn reports to COAG. SCOCA has day-to-day responsibility for the delivery of the reforms, and has established a group of senior officials, which meets regularly, to oversee the reforms.

SCOCA has divided the policy development and implementation work into five streams:

- the development of the Inter-Governmental Agreement;
- COAG’s agreed reforms (the Australian Consumer Law, including unfair contract terms, civil penalties, enforcement powers and consumer remedies);
- COAG’s agreed national product safety regulatory regime;
- the development of reforms, where it is generally agreed that the TPA is not adequate, based on best practice in state and territory laws; and
- operational issues, including enforcement, education and compliance.

The purpose of this paper is to provide information about the reforms and to seek input on specific issues arising from them. Further formal and informal consultation will be undertaken in relation to the draft provisions of the Australian Consumer Law as they are made ready.
CHAPTER 3
THE CURRENT NATIONAL CONSUMER POLICY FRAMEWORK

Generic consumer protections in Australia

Generic consumer protections are those laws which are designed to protect a consumer in relation to potentially harmful or exploitative conduct by a supplier which could occur in a transaction taking place in any sector of the economy. Such provisions generally either prohibit specific forms of conduct or provide a consumer with a right to take legal action in respect to harm that he or she suffers as a result of specific conduct.

Generic consumer protections for Australian consumers are currently found in 12 separate laws: the TPA and the ASIC Act, which apply nationally, and in 10 state and territory FTAs.\(^\text{17}\) In addition, each State and Territory has industry-specific regulation in different laws. While many of the generic protections contained in these laws are broadly consistent, for a long time there have been a large number of small differences between them. In recent years, more significant differences have started to emerge which show an increasing trend towards augmenting the common generic protections (which are shared with the TPA) with additional protections, such as:

- the various additional categories of false and misleading representations prohibited in state and territory FTAs over the years;

- the ACT’s provisions on the regulation of credit card limit increases;

- Victoria’s provisions dealing with unfair contract terms; and

- NSW, Victoria and SA’s similar but differing rules concerning telemarketing.

The once gradual but, in some respects, now substantial shift away from largely consistent generic consumer laws means that the current framework has become more costly for consumers and businesses, while providing few, if any, counterbalancing benefits.\(^\text{18}\)

There are many differences between Australian consumer laws which have significant implications for the consistency of those laws. The major differences identified by the PC Review are set out below:

- The definition of ‘consumer’: There are significant differences between jurisdictions in how a ‘consumer’ is defined for the purposes of consumer protection under the TPA, ASIC Act and FTAs. The two main qualities used to define categories of consumers between jurisdictions are whether the goods or services are acquired for personal and domestic or business use, and the value of the goods or services purchased (most jurisdictions use $40,000 as the upper threshold).19

- Objects of the TPA and FTAs: There are significant differences between the objects provisions of the various Australian consumer laws. Objects provisions can be significant as an aid to judicial interpretation and therefore differences can influence judicial outcomes for consumers seeking to utilise a particular consumer provision. They can also reflect and inform very different approaches to issues of policy development and enforcement.20

- Implied conditions and warranties: Inconsistencies exist as to the application of implied warranties and conditions nationally. Only the TPA and the FTAs of NSW and NT extend implied conditions and warranties to consumers who have not had a contractual relationship with the supplier.21

- Industry-specific regulation: The PC recognised significant differences in industry-specific consumer regulation in the energy, food, credit, tobacco, electrical products and therapeutic goods industries. The PC also expressed concern that some industry-specific legislation is overly prescriptive and unnecessary, given the existence of generic consumer protections. Furthermore, changes to industry-specific regulation often occur, which creates ongoing complexity and costs to businesses as they attempt to maintain compliance across jurisdictions.22

COAG has agreed a process for reviewing industry-specific regulation across all Australian jurisdictions with a view to removing differences where possible. This area of work falls outside the scope of the development of the Australian Consumer Law.

- Occupational licensing: The PC found that, out of approximately 100 consumer-related occupations licensed by the States and Territories, more than 30 are licensed in only one or two jurisdictions.23 This raises questions as to the necessity of such licensing schemes and their ongoing economic impacts.

COAG has also agreed on 3 July 2008 to develop a national trade licensing system that will remove inconsistencies across state borders and allow for a much more mobile workforce. This area of work falls outside of the scope of the development of the Australian Consumer Law.

- Product standards: Product safety standard provisions, modelled on those in the TPA, are included in the NSW, NT, WA, Queensland and Victorian FTAs. Victoria, Queensland and SA also have legislation that allows for mandatory standards to be applied to services.24

- Enforcement and remedies: Enforcement of consumer laws is split between the state and territory fair trading offices and the national regulators, the ACCC and ASIC. State and territory regulators generally focus on issues that affect consumers within their jurisdiction, and the national regulators generally have a wider focus on issues with an inter-state or national dimension (which can include conduct that takes place within a particular jurisdiction).

There is also a high degree of cooperation between consumer regulators in relation to enforcement issues affecting their respective areas of responsibility. With the development of an increasingly national economy, and the increase of inter-state activities by many businesses, issues of enforcement responsibility are becoming more complex and require greater coordination and cooperation between regulators.

The diversity of consumer regulators is also reflected in the wide range of regulatory approaches that they adopt in enforcing consumer laws, regulating business activity and in informing and educating the public. These reflect a range of practical considerations, including the limitations on national regulators’ powers to regulate the conduct of unincorporated businesses, the costs and the needs of the industry being regulated, but also the regulatory objectives and culture of the organisation concerned, informed by the legislation it is responsible for enforcing. Variable outcomes for consumers across Australia occur due to the divergent requirements for businesses, differences in enforcement intensity and jurisdictional priorities.

The current consumer law enforcement framework

Consumer law enforcement in Australia is shared between national, state and territory regulators. This reflects the division of responsibilities within Australia’s federal system.

At the national level, the ACCC enforces the generic consumer protections of the TPA in all Australian jurisdictions. The ACCC can enforce breaches of the law against corporations and, in certain circumstances, individuals, reflecting the limits imposed under the Australian Constitution.

ASIC monitors and promotes market integrity and consumer protection in relation to the Australian financial system, and enforces the investor protection provisions of the ASIC Act. The ASIC Act applies to all businesses in Australia, and is not limited to corporations, as a consequence of a referral of power by the States and Territories in 2001. The TPA’s consumer protection provisions exclude the provision of financial services from their scope. The investor protection provisions of the ASIC Act are expressed in terms broadly consistent with the generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA.

26 PC 2008 II.19.
27 The ACCC may take action against individuals on the basis of ancillary liability and under the extended liability provisions of section 6 of the TPA.
There are eight lead regulators that administer and enforce the respective consumer protection laws of the States and Territories:

- New South Wales — Office of Fair Trading;
- Victoria — Consumer Affairs Victoria;
- Queensland — Office of Fair Trading;
- Western Australia — Department of Commerce;
- South Australia — Office of Consumer and Business Affairs;
- Tasmania — Office of Consumer Affairs and Fair Trading;
- Australian Capital Territory — Consumer Affairs and Fair Trading (within the Office of Regulatory Services); and
- Northern Territory — Office of Consumer and Business Affairs.

These regulators may take action for a breach of consumer laws by any entity or person (subject to the scope of Commonwealth power). These regulators also have extensive responsibilities for regulating business conduct in their respective jurisdictions, both generally and in relation to specific business sectors.

The division of jurisdictional and functional responsibilities between the different regulators is not always straightforward and has been a long-term source of confusion for consumers and industry alike. While this is so, there exist formal and informal mechanisms for regulators to cooperate in relation to enforcement issues, which are designed to overcome these challenges.

Relationship with the product safety law reforms

In July 2008, COAG agreed to reforms to Australia’s product safety laws to provide for a single national law and a streamlined enforcement system. In doing so, it committed to the implementation of these reforms by the end of 2010. The Australian Consumer Law will integrate the national consumer product safety law into its provisions. A description of these reforms is set out in Chapter 8 of this Paper.
CHAPTER 4
THE BASIS OF THE AUSTRALIAN CONSUMER LAW

The Trade Practices Act 1974 as a base for the Australian Consumer Law

COAG agreed, on the basis of the PC’s recommendation, that the Australian Consumer Law should be based on the existing generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA. The PC based its recommendation on the TPA’s role as the foundation of current generic provisions in state and territory laws and the most practical stepping-off point for the new law (a description of the main aspects of the TPA is set out in the box below).29

Most of the key generic consumer protection provisions are found in Part V of the TPA, although related provisions are found in many other parts of the TPA (see Table 4.1). The generic provisions of the TPA are also reflected in existing state and territory consumer laws. A table, which compares the existing generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA with similar provisions in state and territory laws, is set out in Attachment B.

COAG agreed to three specific proposals to augment the current provisions of the TPA: the inclusion of a provision regulating unfair contract terms, the inclusion of a range of additional penalties, enforcement powers and consumer remedies, and the implementation of a new national product safety regulatory system. These are discussed in more detail in Part II of this Paper.

COAG also agreed that, based on the PC’s recommendation, the generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA should be either augmented or modified where it is generally agreed that they are not adequate to deal with particular issues, and that these changes should be based on best practice in existing state and territory consumer protection laws.30 In this respect, the process for developing the Australian Consumer Law will involve a review of the effectiveness of the existing consumer protection and related provisions of the TPA and, where generally agreed by the Australian Government, the States and the Territories, changes being made.

In this regard, SCOCA seeks the views of stakeholders on the current effectiveness of the provisions of the TPA that concern consumer protection issues or are otherwise relevant to them, and how they may be improved. State and territory governments, through SCOCA, have made a series of suggested augmentations or modifications to the TPA’s provisions, which are discussed in Part III of this Paper.

The consumer provisions of the Trade Practices Act 1974

Definition of ‘consumer’

Section 4B of the TPA defines a ‘consumer’ for certain purposes of the Act (principally Division 2 of Part V, concerning implied conditions and warranties). A ‘consumer’ is defined as a buyer (who is either an individual or a corporation) of any kind of goods or services with a price of no more than $40,000 or, if the price of the goods and services is more than $40,000, they were of a kind ordinarily acquired for personal, domestic or household use or consumption or the goods consisted of a commercial road vehicle.

The definition also requires that the goods should not, irrespective of their price, be acquired for the purpose of resupply or for the purpose of using them up or transforming them, in trade or commerce, in the course of a process of manufacture or of repairing or treating other goods or fixtures on land. This means that, in respect of certain consumer protection provisions, goods used by businesses that fall outside of these conditions may be covered by the TPA. Similarly in those instances, any services that are acquired by a business for $40,000 or less are also covered by the TPA. Furthermore, any goods or services ordinarily of a kind acquired for personal, domestic or household use, even if acquired for a price of more than $40,000, may be covered by the TPA as long as they are not acquired for the purposes of resupply.

The definition of ‘consumer’ is used for specific purposes in the generic consumer protection provisions of the TPA to apply only to specific categories of person or, in some cases, business. The definition does not apply to some provisions, most notably sections 52 and 53 of the TPA, which have a general application and are not constrained by the definition of ‘consumer’.

Unconscionable conduct

Section 51AA of the TPA prohibits unconscionable conduct and extends the remedies available in the Act to unconscionable conduct within the meaning of the unwritten law, from time to time, of the States and Territories. Section 51AB of the TPA prohibits unconscionable conduct in relation to the supply of goods and services to consumers. The section sets out a range of considerations that the court may take into account in determining whether there has been unconscionable conduct. Section 51AC of the TPA extends the prohibition on unconscionable conduct to business transactions, and sets out in some detail the issues that the court may take into account.

The consumer protection provisions

Misleading and deceptive conduct

Most broadly, section 52 of the TPA prohibits any conduct in trade or commerce which misleads and deceives or is likely to do so. This provision does not seek to impose liability but establishes a norm of conduct that businesses should not mislead consumers. In doing so, it does not require a court to consider whether a business intended to mislead or deceive, only that its conduct had the effect of doing so.
Section 52 creates a right of action in respect of a breach of this provision, the remedies for which are injunctions and the other civil remedies provided for in the TPA (see the discussion of civil remedies below). No other penalties available under the TPA are available.

Specific prohibitions on unfair practices

Section 52 of the TPA is complemented by a range of other provisions which prohibit more specific forms of unfair practices, including false and misleading representations (section 53), unconscionable conduct (Part IVA), referral selling (section 57) and pyramid selling (Part V, Division 1AAA). These provisions are generic in their approach, and do not relate to specific industry sectors. These provisions are subject to civil remedies or criminal sanctions (by virtue of Part VC of the TPA) and, in some circumstances, both. Only civil remedies apply in respect of breaches of section 52 of the TPA.

Section 53 of the TPA prohibits specific forms of false or misleading representations in connection with the supply or possible supply of goods or services. Section 53 applies to all types of business activities relating to the sale of goods and services and is not limited to any particular set of circumstances (such as an activity that may be specific to a particular industry). Types of proscribed false and misleading representations include those made in relation to the standard, quality, value or grade of goods or services, representations that goods are new, or those made about the price of goods or services.

Part V also includes a range of provisions which prohibit other, more specific, forms of unfair practices. For example, Part V includes prohibitions on:

- bait advertising (section 56 of the TPA), where corporations know or ought to be aware they are unlikely to be able to supply goods;
- referral selling (section 57 of the TPA), where a purchase is induced by the promise of receiving a commission for referring other customers; and
- pyramid selling (Part V, Division 1AAA), which prohibits selling and commission scheme, with no underlying economic rationale.

These are types of conduct that the Parliament has determined as being, in all cases, detrimental to consumers.

Other forms of consumer protection in the TPA

The TPA also includes some more detailed legislative regimes regulating specific forms of consumer protection. These include the regulation of product safety (Part V, Division 1A), implied warranties (Part V, Division 2) and importers’ and manufacturers’ liability (Part V, Division 2A).

These detailed regulatory regimes provide for very specific forms of consumer protection and also create, in some cases, additional administrative processes to facilitate them. For example, in relation to product safety, regulation is intended to remove or substantially reduce the potential for serious injury or death, and, as such, can provide for what may be considered in other regulatory contexts to be much more interventionist approaches to compliance and enforcement.
Existing enforcement powers

Investigative tools

The ACCC has a range of investigative tools available to assist in investigating possible breaches of the consumer protection provisions of the TPA under Part XII of the TPA. The ACCC can require persons or businesses to provide it with information and, in certain circumstances, can share that information with other enforcement agencies. For example, section 155 of the TPA allows the ACCC, if it believes a person is capable of furnishing information relating to a possible breach of the TPA, to require that person to provide documents or give written or oral evidence.

Specific provisions in Part XID of the TPA also allow the ACCC to enter and search premises and to seize documents, either with the consent of the affected party or a warrant issued by a magistrate.

Administrative remedies

In taking action for a breach of the consumer protection provisions of the TPA, the ACCC can, in place of taking formal legal proceedings, also accept court-enforceable undertakings under section 87B from a party that it considers has breached the TPA. Such an undertaking involves the person or business making admissions about their conduct, giving undertakings that they will not engage in the alleged conduct in the future, undertaking to do specific things (including, for example, corrective advertising, providing redress to harmed parties, instituting compliance programs or related measures or community service activities). A breach of the undertaking is then enforceable in court and, if breached, the ACCC can seek orders enforcing the terms of the undertaking and such other remedies as the court sees fit.

The ACCC issues guidance about the circumstances in which it will use section 87B undertakings.31

Civil remedies

A breach of the consumer protection provisions in the TPA creates a civil liability and exposes the wrongdoer to action by the ACCC or private claimants seeking civil remedies. Section 80 of the TPA provides for the court to make both interlocutory and permanent injunctions, which can either restrain a person or business in breach from engaging or continuing to engage in certain conduct or require specific actions to be undertaken. A breach of an injunction is a contempt of court, and subject to the penalties that apply to that offence.

Private litigants may also seek monetary damages under section 82 of the TPA in respect of the loss or damage derived from a breach of the Act. The ACCC may also seek damages, but only on behalf of parties named in the ACCC’s action.

31 http://www.accc.gov.au/content/index.phtml/itemId/344494#h2_122.
The ACCC may also seek non-punitive orders against a business found to have breached the Act under section 86C of the TPA, including community service orders, probation orders or corrective advertising orders. These remedies are not available to private litigants.

The ACCC often also seeks orders under section 83 of the TPA that findings of fact be made in relation to the issues that are the subject of those enforcement proceedings. These findings may then be used as the basis of subsequent private proceedings initiated by individuals or businesses suffering harm as a result of the conduct.

Section 87 of the TPA allows the court to make a range of other orders, as appropriate.

Criminal sanctions

Part VC of the TPA creates a regime of specific criminal offences relating to the unfair practices prohibited in Part V, Division 1 (except for section 52) and pyramid selling, which is prohibited by Division 1AAA. Each provision in Part VC sets out the elements of the offence and the sanctions available for these. At present, sanctions are limited to fines, and the maximum monetary penalties for a breach are up to 10,000 penalty units ($1.1 million) for a corporation or 2,000 penalty units ($220,000) for an individual.

In practice, criminal prosecutions are reserved for the most egregious breaches of the TPA or examples of repeated flouting of the law. A prosecution of an offence under Part VC of the TPA may only be initiated by the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP), having received a brief from, and in consultation with, the ACCC.

CHAPTER 5
IMPLICATIONS FOR NATIONAL, STATE AND TERRITORY CONSUMER LAWS

The TPA as a national market regulation law

For the past 35 years the TPA, as Australia’s principal market regulation law, has regulated competition and consumer issues. This reflects the view held by successive Australian Governments that competition and consumer policy and enforcement have mutually reinforcing roles in making markets work effectively and fairly for the benefit of consumers. Under the application law scheme, the Australian Government will enact the Australian Consumer Law as part of the TPA.

Changes to the TPA

These major reforms will have implications for the form and content of the TPA. In implementing the reforms, there will be a range of changes to the consumer protection provisions of the TPA, involving:

- the inclusion of the Australian Consumer Law as a schedule to the TPA, which will be based on the existing consumer protection provisions of the TPA;
- the amendment of the existing consumer protection provisions of the TPA to reflect the nationally agreed provisions of the Australian Consumer Law;
- the inclusion of new provisions in the TPA which provide an administrative underpinning for the application law scheme giving effect to the Australian Consumer Law; and
- other necessary changes flowing from these reforms.

A new name for the TPA

As part of these major reforms to Australia’s consumer laws, the Australian Government suggests that the TPA should be renamed the Competition and Consumer Act (CCA) to provide greater clarity as to the functions of the TPA and reflect the complementary and mutually reinforcing nature of consumer and competition policy.32

In making such a change, it will be clear to consumers and businesses alike that the legislation has two functions: the promotion of competition and the protection of consumers.

32 This change would require consequential amendments to be made to all Commonwealth and state and territory laws that refer to the TPA. This would include laws that do not, necessarily, concern consumer protection issues, for example, States and Territories would need to amend their legislation applying the Competition Code 1995.
While the term ‘trade practices’ is broadly descriptive, it no longer provides clarity to the general public as to the purposes underlying Australia’s national market regulation law.

Renaming the TPA in this way would also bring it into line with the name of the ACCC, which was renamed in 1995 when the functions of the Trade Practices Commission and the Prices Surveillance Authority were combined.

Question

Should the TPA be renamed? If so, what name should it have, if not the Competition and Consumer Act?

Implications for national financial services laws

All Australian governments have agreed that generic national consumer law provisions should apply to all sectors of the economy, reflecting the PC’s recommendation 4.2. However, they also recognise that constitutional issues may mean that the financial services sector will need to retain a distinct legislative framework, due to the Commonwealth’s different powers to regulate these areas under the Australian Constitution.

In this regard, the Australian Government has provided an ongoing commitment to maintain consistency between the Australian Consumer Law’s generic provisions and the consumer (or investor) protection provisions in credit and financial services laws, to the extent that it is practicable to do so.

Australia’s financial services laws are currently the subject of a reform process, and the Australian Government has consulted on proposed reforms outlined in its Green Paper on Financial Services and Credit Reform[^34] in 2008. The States and Territories have also agreed to refer their credit regulation powers to the Commonwealth, which will necessitate a review of consumer protection provisions that apply in that sector. COAG also agreed to the establishment of uniform national laws for the regulation of consumer credit to be administered by the Australian Government. The Minister for Superannuation and Corporate Law, Senator the Hon Nick Sherry, has published a National Consumer Credit Action Plan outlining the reform process for credit laws.[^35]

Implications for existing state and territory consumer laws

The reforms outlined in this Paper will introduce national consistency in generic consumer protections, which currently exist, in broadly similar terms, in state and territory FTAs. In accordance with COAG’s agreement, the Australian Consumer Law will be applied by each [^33]: There has been no referral of the States’ powers to regulate consumer issues generally. Reforms to Australia’s companies and securities legislation undertaken in 2001 involved a referral of power by the States to the Commonwealth in respect of the issues covered by the Corporations Law as a consequence of the High Court’s decision in Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally; Re Wakim; Ex parte Darvall; Re Brown; Ex parte Amann; Spinks v Prentice (1999) 163 ALR 270. These changes led to the enactment of the Corporations Act 2001 and the ASIC Act. In 2008, COAG agreed that the States would refer their powers in relation to the regulation of consumer credit to the Commonwealth. This is being progressed.

State and Territory and will become part of the law of each State and Territory. This will mean that all those provisions in FTAs that are superseded by the Australian Consumer Law will be replaced by the provisions of the Law.

Each State and Territory will retain in their FTAs a range of provisions which regulate sector-specific issues, and these will remain as part of the laws of the States and Territories. COAG has also agreed to a process to review sector-specific regulation, and this is being progressed.
Part II

COAG’s agreed consumer law reforms
CHAPTER 6
UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS

On 2 October 2008, COAG agreed to the inclusion of a provision regulating unfair contract terms in the Australian Consumer Law, in the terms proposed by MCCA on 15 August 2008.\textsuperscript{36} The details of the proposed provision are set out in more detail in this chapter.

Unfair contract terms regulation

What are unfair contract terms?

Unfair contract terms are those that cause a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations arising under a contract and are not reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate business interests of the supplier.\textsuperscript{37} Two common examples of unfair contract terms were found to exist in Victoria and the United Kingdom\textsuperscript{38}, where regulation already exists, are reserving the right to vary the contract at any time for any reason or removing liability for interruptions in supply.

Why will the new law regulate unfair terms?

Unfair contract terms appear to be widespread in contracts, particularly in standard form contracts, and the PC concluded that the consumer detriment flowing from them is likely to be non-trivial.\textsuperscript{39} Unfair terms are more likely to be found in standard form contracts, presented to consumers as a ‘take it or leave it’ offer. Uniform contracts have become more widespread as they lower the cost of doing business with large numbers of consumers, and those savings are in part passed on to consumers as lower prices, Furthermore, such contracts are increasingly used in relation to online services.

A national approach to unfair contract terms regulation is a key element of COAG’s agreement. The PC raised the very real risk that, in the absence of a national approach to unfair contract terms, a range of possibly divergent regulatory regimes could emerge\textsuperscript{40}, including the potential for sector-specific regimes, with consequent cost implications for businesses and, ultimately, consumers.

\textsuperscript{36} The MCCA proposal was based on PC 2008 Rec. 7.1, with some modifications.
\textsuperscript{37} PC 2008 II.403.
\textsuperscript{38} Jurisdictions in Australia and abroad have introduced legislation addressing unfair contract terms. Victoria amended its FTA to regulate unfair contract terms in 2003, while the United Kingdom introduced an \textit{Unfair Contract Terms Act} in 1977. Currently, unfair contracts in the UK are also regulated by the \textit{Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999}, which implements European Council Directive 93/13/EC.
\textsuperscript{39} PC 2008 II.152-154; The PC concluded that there is only limited evidence of the extent of their use and consumer detriment arising from them. However, the PC found that improved methods of assessing consumer detriment suggest this detriment is likely to be non-trivial.
\textsuperscript{40} PC 2008 II.433.
In considering the unfair contract terms regulation, the PC identified the following costs associated with the introduction in Australia of such a law:\textsuperscript{41}

- Standard form contracts can provide significant cost savings and, if altered in response to unfair terms regulation, some prices for consumers could rise in the short term.

- Renegotiation of certain terms where it is reasonable for a supplier to vary regularly (for example, mortgage interest rates) would be more costly than unilateral variation.

- The law may weaken the capacity of businesses to deal with a small number of consumers acting in bad faith, limiting in turn their capacity to deal fairly, cheaply and efficiently with the bulk of consumers.

These issues are addressed by the model agreed by COAG for the unfair contract terms provision, which is set out below. While there would be some administrative and compliance costs for governments and businesses, evidence from Victoria and other countries suggests these are not likely to be significant. In fact, the PC report recognised that businesses have not identified major costs associated with the introduction of the EU, UK and Victorian provisions; many businesses support unfair contract terms regulation, and many businesses already comply with similar, industry-specific regimes.\textsuperscript{42}

\textbf{COAG’s agreed model for regulating unfair contract terms}

The PC’s recommended model addressing unfair contract terms\textsuperscript{43} was considered by MCCA at its meeting on 15 August 2008, where it agreed to recommend the incorporation of an unfair contract terms provision to the BRCWG.

On 2 October 2008, COAG agreed to a legislative model including the following features (which include some refinements of the PC’s recommended model):

- A term is ‘unfair’ when it causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations arising under the contract, and it is not reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate interests of the supplier.

The definition will not make reference to ‘good faith’, given the uncertain application of that principle in Australian law. The PC noted the potential for differing interpretations of good faith and that other definitions of an unfair term may be equally apt.\textsuperscript{44} The inclusion of the phrase ‘it is not reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate interests of the supplier’ is designed to ensure that, when applying the test, the question of the business’s reasons for including a provision in a contract is addressed.

\textsuperscript{41} PC 2008 I.34-5; II.155-6, 433-8, see also II. Annex D to the Report for a fuller discussion of the issues.
\textsuperscript{42} PC 2008 II.155, 434-435.
\textsuperscript{43} PC 2008 Rec. 7.1.
\textsuperscript{44} PC 2008 II.159. The UK Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (UTCCR) also contain a reference to ‘good faith’, but the draft Bill prepared by the England and Wales and Scottish Law Commissions, which the UK Government has indicated that it will introduce in due course, has removed it. See The Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission (2005) Unfair Terms in Contracts – Report on a reference under section 3(1)(e) of the Law Commissions Act 1965 (Cm 6464 SE/2005/13) at 39-40.
What sort of contract terms might be covered by the unfair contract terms provisions?

Based on examples of actions taken in other jurisdictions, the following types of terms may be problematic as they are likely to cause consumer detriment:45

- clauses that permit the supplier to unilaterally vary the terms of the contract;
- clauses that prevent the consumer from cancelling a contract;
- clauses that require the payment of fees when the service is not provided;
- clauses that exclude liability for harm resulting from the supplier’s or its agents’ actions;
- clauses that let the supplier supply goods or services that are not those contracted and paid for by the consumer;
- clauses that let only the supplier decide whether to renew or not to renew the contract;
- clauses that penalise only the consumer for breaches of the terms of the contract;
- clauses that permit the supplier to change the price of the goods or services contracted for without allowing the consumer to terminate the contract;
- clauses that permit the supplier to unilaterally determine whether a breach of the contract has occurred or to interpret the contract’s meaning;
- clauses that allow the supplier to assign the contract to the consumer’s detriment, without the consumer’s consent;
- clauses purporting to limit the consumer’s right to take legal action against the supplier;
- clauses limiting the evidence that the consumer is permitted to use in legal proceedings based on the contract;
- clauses imposing the evidential burden on the consumer in legal proceedings;
- clauses that do not permit refunds to consumers when the goods or service are not provided, or which apply conditions to the way in which consumers are refunded;
- clauses that require consumers who breach a contract term or terminate early to pay penalties, in the form of specific additional payments, additional interest or indemnity legal costs, which do not reflect the suppliers’ reasonable costs; and
- clauses that deem something as a fact or that something will be a fact, such as an acknowledgment that certain information has been provided to the consumer prior to the agreement being made, regardless of whether or not it was.

• Remedies will be available only where the claimant (an individual or a class) shows detriment to the consumer (individually or as a class), or a substantial likelihood of detriment, not limited to financial detriment.

This element of the model reflects the PC’s recommendation46, although it makes it clear that action may also be undertaken on the basis of a ‘substantial likelihood of detriment’. This recognises concerns about the limitations that a requirement limiting enforcement action to actual detriment would place on the effectiveness of enforcing the provision in practice. However, by requiring a proof of a ‘substantial likelihood of detriment’ in the particular case, the provision would require more than a theoretical case of potential detriment to be made out, but would require proof of either actual detriment or a substantial likelihood of detriment. This recognises concerns about the potential for regulatory overreach, should no such limitation be applied.47

The scope of the provision will extend to standard form contracts entered into by businesses, including small businesses, and would not be confined to individual consumers. This recognises that many businesses are required to use standard form agreements in the same way as individual consumers, and their interests are essentially the same in respect of the potential for unfair contract terms.

• The provision will relate only to standard form, non-negotiated contracts. Should a supplier allege that the contract at issue is not a standard form contract, then the onus will be on the supplier to prove that it is not.

This element of the model reflects the PC’s view that the inclusion of negotiated contracts would involve risks that exceeded the likely benefits.48

Reversing the onus of proof in relation to whether the contract is in a standard form or not, will ensure that the potential for abuse of this provision is minimised. This would also allow a court examining a contract to consider whether the contract is, in effect, in a standard form, regardless of the use of devices like an acknowledgment by the consumer that the contract has been negotiated, or the inclusion of trivial ‘negotiated’ terms.

46 as per PC 2008 II.139.
47 see PC 2008 II.139.
48 PC 2008 II.161.
What types of contracts would be covered by unfair contract terms regulation?

Standard form contracts are used in many consumer and commercial contexts, including:

- utility services (electricity, gas, water and sewerage);
- communications services (telephony and internet);
- banking and financial services, including credit agreements;
- software end user licences, e-commerce and m-commerce transactions and online auctions;
- public and private transport services, including airline, bus and rail tickets;
- domestic building, renovation and maintenance services;
- professional services, including services provided by lawyers, engineers, surveyors, architects, consultants and others;
- courier and delivery services;
- subscription services, including pay television and magazine and newspaper subscriptions;
- leisure services, including health and fitness centre memberships, event tickets and holiday packages;
- motor vehicle maintenance, hire car rentals and car parking;
- residential and retail tenancies; and
- publicly and privately provided vocational training and professional development services.
• The provision will exclude the upfront price of the good or service\textsuperscript{49}, using the approach currently adopted in regulation 6(2) of the United Kingdom’s Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (UTCCR).

Upfront price is excluded because it would be contrary to general contractual and economic principles to allow consumers to challenge easily understood upfront prices at a later time on the basis that they are unfair. Regulation 6(2) of the UTCCR provides that:

‘In so far as it is in plain intelligible language, the assessment of fairness of a term shall not relate — (a) to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract, or (b) to the adequacy of the price or remuneration, as against the goods or service supplied in exchange.’

• The provision will require all of the circumstances of the contract to be considered, taking into account the broader interests of consumers, as well as the particular consumers affected.\textsuperscript{50}

The PC noted that implicit consideration of the broader impacts of any particular term being deemed unfair should be relevant to the application of any new provision.\textsuperscript{51}

Where these conditions are met, the unfair term would be voided only for the contracts of those consumers or class of consumers subject to detriment (or a substantial likelihood thereof), with suppliers also potentially liable to damages for that detriment, along with the other remedies that will be available under the Australian Consumer Law. This reflects the PC’s recommendation that the use of the provision should be confined to situations where there is detriment (including a substantial likelihood of it).\textsuperscript{52}

The provision will allow for private (and regulator-led) representative actions for damages by a class of consumers detrimentally affected by unfair contract terms.\textsuperscript{53} There would also be scope to ban certain types of terms that are, in all circumstances, considered to be unfair.

Transitional arrangements should be put in place after enactment, which would give businesses time to modify their contracts.\textsuperscript{54} There will be single national guidance on the enforcement of unfair contract terms regulation issued by the national and state and territory enforcement agencies.

The operation and effects of the new provision will be reviewed within five years of its introduction.\textsuperscript{55}

Banning certain types of unfair contract terms

The unfair contract terms provision will provide for the banning of certain contract terms on the basis that they are considered, in all circumstances, to be unfair. The use of these terms would expose a supplier to enforcement action under the Australian Consumer Law.\textsuperscript{56}

Question

Please set out any views on whether the types of terms described in this chapter should be banned in the initial text of the Australian Consumer Law.

Terms retaining title for suppliers in goods that cannot be removed from consumers’ premises without damage; terms allowing suppliers to repossess such goods

Title retention clauses (also called ‘Romalpa clauses’) and repossession rights seek to secure payment of the price and, in themselves, are not generally considered to be unfair in their effect on consumers. However, in the consumer context, the exercise of a term that enables suppliers to enter a consumer’s home and remove fixtures (for example, carpets or other types of fixed floor coverings, swimming pools or bench-top stoves) can often leave the premises in a damaged state and seriously disrupt the lives of the consumer and their family. In many cases, the repossessed goods are not, or are not easily reusable by the supplier and the threat of the exercise of such rights is often used to intimidate consumers into paying debts owed (or allegedly owed) to the supplier.

Terms denying the existence or validity of pre- or post-contractual representations made to consumers; ‘entire agreement’ terms; terms deeming something a fact

Terms that:

\begin{itemize}
  \item deny the existence or effect of oral representations;
  \item require the consumer to agree, for instance, that no representations have been made that are not in the written contract;
  \item specify that the only valid representations or waivers of the supplier’s rights are those in writing signed by a senior officer of the supplier; or \item state that the written document contains the entire agreement of the parties, \end{itemize}

can be said to have the object or effect of deterring or preventing consumers from pursuing claims based on oral or implied representations, agreements or terms.

Terms that deem something to be a fact or under which consumers agree that something is a fact (for example, that the goods or services supplied meet the terms of the contract) or terms that deem consumers to have done something (for example, that the consumer has obtained necessary consents or permits) are of a similar nature. Whether or not such matters exist or are true or have been done are questions of fact. These terms can seek to deny the facts in \textsuperscript{56} The material set out in this section draws heavily on policy development work undertaken by Consumer Affairs Victoria in relation to reforms to the unfair contract terms provisions of Part 2B of Victorian FTA.

relevant circumstances and they act as an unfair limitation on consumers’ rights to sue suppliers and the evidence that consumers can lead in proceedings on the contract.57

Examples

‘It is agreed between the parties hereto that the terms and conditions contained herein constitute the entire agreement between the parties and that oral statements made prior to this agreement neither induced its execution nor form part of it.’

‘The customer acknowledges having received the vehicle in a clean condition and in sound working order, in accordance with the vehicle condition report, and with a full fuel tank and a bottle of gas.’

‘If you repudiate this Rental Agreement, we may give you notice terminating this Rental Agreement, and then you must immediately: a) pay to us the Termination Amount calculated in accordance with Clause 11, which amount you agree is a genuine pre-estimate of the loss that we will suffer by reason of your breach and repudiation of this Rental Agreement.’

‘Delay does not prevent us exercising our rights under the Contract, and failure by us to enforce a right does not prevent our enforcing other rights, or the same right on a future occasion.’

Terms under which consumers acknowledge that they have read or understood the contract

Whether a person has read a contract is an objective matter of fact and it is not unfair to require consumers who have, in fact, read the contract they are about to sign, to acknowledge that fact. There is often no legal advantage to be gained by including such a requirement as the law has always regarded the question of whether a person has read the contract that they have signed as immaterial to the question whether they are bound by it.58 However, whether consumers have understood the contract (that is, its meaning and effect) is not an objective matter and cannot be resolved simply by requiring consumers to acknowledge that they have understood the contract, even if they have also said that they do understand the contract. It is impossible to know, without searching inquiry, whether their understanding is correct. Further, where consumers have not, in fact, properly understood their contracts, then these terms seek to deny that fact.

57 It is not considered unfair for a contract to specify that representations, waivers and amendments must be in writing and signed by a senior officer of the supplier etc, if there is no implication that these are the only valid representations/waivers/amendments, and if the term does not otherwise seek to deny the validity of oral or implied representations/waivers/amendments/terms.

58 L’Estrange v Graucob [1934] 2 KB 394; Toll (FCGT)N Pty Ltd v Alphapharm Pty Ltd [2004] 219 CLR 165.
For consumers claiming that unusual terms were not brought to their attention, nor their nature and effect explained to them before they signed the contract, these terms have the object or effect of deterring or preventing them from pursuing such claims. Such terms can constitute an unfair limitation on a consumer’s right to sue the supplier and on the evidence a consumer can lead in proceedings on the contract.

Example

‘I have read and understand my obligations and rights in relation to this agreement and will abide by all membership conditions, rules and regulations stated overleaf. I accept that it is a condition of use of my membership rights that I must comply with them.’

Conclusive evidence terms

It is not unfair for suppliers to stipulate that certain things they generate (for example, statements of amounts owing) are prima facie evidence of their contents, particularly where such matters are primarily in the knowledge of the supplier. However, it may be considered that it can never be fair to stipulate that such things are conclusive evidence of their contents, because such terms have the object or effect of deterring or preventing consumers from pursuing claims based on conflicting evidence, and, axiomatically, have the object (if not, in practice, the effect) of limiting the evidence that consumers can lead in proceedings on the contract.

Example

‘A statement or certificate given by or on behalf of the owner stating the amount owed by the client to the owner and/or the occurrence of any event shall be conclusive evidence of the amount or event.’

Terms that are void under laws that imply certain terms into contracts; terms that otherwise limit suppliers’ liability for their negligence

In existing consumer laws, for example Part 2A of the Victorian FTA and Division 2 of Part V of the TPA, there are set out a range of terms that are to be implied into contracts for defined sales of goods and services (for example, implied terms requiring goods to be of merchantable quality and services to be rendered with due care and skill). Such terms cannot be excluded and, in relation to sales of consumer goods and services, they cannot be limited. Exclusions and limitations, even for consequential/economic loss, are void and it is also an offence to purport to exclude or limit the terms.

59 It is also unfair under Part 2B of the Victorian FTA to purport to exclude or limit the statutory terms, as such exclusions or limitations have the object or effect of limiting consumers’ rights to sue suppliers (see section 32X(k) of the Victorian FTA).
Many terms that exclude or limit suppliers’ liability for loss or damage suffered by the consumer from the suppliers’ acts or omissions attempt to cater for the statutory terms with words such as ‘to the extent permitted by law’, or other words that only indirectly refer to consumers’ statutory rights. Such caveats do necessarily have the effect of altering the situation because most consumers will not know what that ‘law’ is. While such terms give the appearance of complying with the law, they signify nothing to consumers who are ignorant of their rights.60

In the same vein, it may be considered that it is invariably unfair to exclude or limit the liability that suppliers would otherwise have for their common law negligence. However, given the small amounts ordinarily at stake in a consumer contract, it is not considered unfair for the supplier to limit its liability for consequential/economic loss as a result of its negligence.

Examples

‘To the extent permitted by law, under no circumstances shall [the supplier] be vicariously liable for any deliberately wrongful act, default or omission by any employee.’

‘The owner will not be liable to the client or any persons claiming under the client in contract or in tort in respect of any direct, indirect or consequential loss, damage, expense or injury suffered by the client or any other person arising out of or relating to the agreement, its performance, any delay in its performance or its non-performance (including, by way of illustration and not limitation, liability due to the negligence or default of the owner), or any error (whether negligent or not) in information supplied to the client before or after the date of the agreement or in connection with it.’

‘Apart from terms, conditions and warranties which are implied by law and are incapable of exclusion, we give no condition, warranty or representation as to ownership, description, condition, merchantability, suitability or fitness (whether for a particular or any purpose) of the equipment, and no such term, condition or warrant will be implied.’

Flat/fixed early termination fees and those requiring the paying out of the contract

Some contracts allow consumers to terminate early and others provide for early termination on the occurrence of a stated event. In whatever way an early termination arises, the contract usually requires consumers to pay a fee, which is, or which is claimed to be, compensation for the loss suppliers will incur because of the early termination.

60 They will also not prevent liability-exclusion clauses from constituting false or misleading representations concerning the existence, exclusion or effect of any condition, warranty, guarantee, right or remedy, contra section 12(k) (now section 53(g)) of the TPA: see Trade Practices Commission v Radio World Pty Ltd (1989) ATPR 40-973.
The general law on liquidated damages clauses regulates early termination fees that are imposed where early termination is a breach of the contract. To be valid, such damages must not be penalties, meaning that they must be a genuine pre-estimate of the loss that a supplier would suffer by the breach. That can either be a genuine pre-estimate of the supplier’s lost net profit or of its wasted costs. The High Court has said that ‘[t]he propounded penalty must be judged “extravagant and unconscionable in amount”. It is not enough that it should be lacking in proportion. It must be “out of all proportion”’. 61

Because the question under the general law is whether the liquidated damages are a genuine pre-estimate of loss, the assessment is made prospectively, as at the date of the contract, and it is irrelevant if the amount ultimately imposed under the term proves to be more (even much more) than the actual loss suffered.

Putting aside the issue of whether an early termination fee was individually negotiated or brought to the consumer’s attention, under the agreed unfair contract terms legislative model it would be unfair, and therefore void, if it causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations arising under the contract and it is not reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate business interests of the supplier. This applies regardless of whether it is imposed because early termination is a breach of the contract, or as a consequence of the consumer exercising a right to terminate early, or as a consequence of the contract terminating early because of the occurrence of a stated event.

Further, the question under the agreed legislative model is whether the term causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations. This means that, contrary to the general law, judging the unfairness of an early termination fee under the agreed model would not appear to be restricted to the situation applying when the contract was signed, nor to whether the imbalance is ‘extravagant and unconscionable’/‘out of all proportion’. Under the agreed model, the question would appear to be whether, in its terms or in its application, an early termination fee causes a significant imbalance to the consumer’s detriment.

Therefore, an early termination fee that could or does produce an amount that is significantly more than the loss that the supplier could or does suffer by the early termination would likely be unfair.

Fees that seek to recoup wasted costs but which are flat or fixed amounts applying regardless of when the contract is terminated cannot be genuine pre-estimates of such costs. They are otherwise unfair, because they cannot and do not take account of the extent to which those costs have been recouped or amortised, for example, by payments under the contract, the amount of which varies according to when the contract is terminated.62

Similarly, fees that seek to recoup lost net profit but which simply require the paying out of the remainder of the contract price (sometimes called ‘accelerated payment’ clauses) cannot be genuine pre-estimates of such profit. They are otherwise unfair, because they cannot and do not take account of the costs that would have been incurred in performing the remainder 61 Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd [2005] HCA 71 at [32].

62 Nor, in relevant cases, do they take account of whether the supplier would have made a loss on the contract (whereby the costs would have been wasted anyhow).
of the contract, nor of the requisite discount for the value of the early receipt of the remainder of the contract price.63

Terms requiring consumers to pay more than suppliers’ reasonable enforcement costs reasonably incurred

Terms requiring consumers to pay suppliers’ enforcement costs on an indemnity basis, or that simply require consumers to pay suppliers’ enforcement costs, may be considered always to be unfair because they require, or could require, consumers to pay for unreasonably or inefficiently incurred costs. Further, they provide no incentive for suppliers to be reasonable or efficient.64

Examples

‘I agree to pay you all default costs as they are incurred.’

(personal loan contract)

‘If for any reason the client fails to comply with any of its obligations under this agreement the owner may in its discretion do anything necessary to make good that failure … and do anything (including taking any legal proceedings) which the owner considers desirable to protect or enforce its rights in relation to the equipment and this agreement … The client indemnifies the owner in respect of any payments made by the owner pursuant to this clause.’

Terms requiring consumers to pay deposits or pre-payments that do not leave a substantial amount of the price to be paid on delivery/installation/performance

A distinction is drawn here between pre-payments (or part-payments) and deposits. A deposit is an amount that is intended to ensure that the consumer is serious/bona fide about proceeding with the contract65 in the situation where the supplier will refrain from dealing with other potential purchasers, proceed to allocate resources to the contract, or proceed to expend time and effort preparing for the performance of the contract.

The law allows a genuine deposit to be forfeited if consumers do not proceed with their contracts (provided it is a reasonable amount and not a disguised penalty), regardless of the actual losses suffered by the supplier.66

63 Nor, in relevant cases, do they take account of the value of suppliers’ obligations to take reasonable steps to mitigate their loss, for example, the net proceeds of any resale of goods recovered or the net value of any replacement contract that did eventuate or should have eventuated.

64 A term requiring a party to pay ‘all’ costs would normally be subject to an implied qualification that such costs be properly incurred, that is, reasonably and in good faith: see for example, Elders Trustees & Executor Co Ltd v Eagle Star Nominees Ltd (1988) 4 BPR [97256] at 9208 per McLelland J, who said: ‘This is in my view so obvious that it did not require expression …’

65 What the cases often refer to as an ‘earnest of performance’.

66 For example, Luu v Sovereign Developments Pty Ltd [2006] NSWCA 40 at [24] per Bryson JA, who noted that 10% ‘has long been usual’ in the sale of land context; see also Ianello v Sharpe [2007] NSWCA 61.
On the other hand, the rationale for pre-payments is that they enable suppliers safely to commence work on a contract. In some cases, they are required to cover the cost of purchasing necessary materials, particularly if the materials are specialised for the job and so cannot be used for other contracts.

A pre-payment should be refundable if the consumer opts not to proceed with the contract, minus any actual (and reasonable) losses suffered by the supplier.

However, it may be considered to be unfair to require all or substantially all of the price to be paid at the outset, or an amount that does not leave a substantial amount of the price to be paid at either delivery, installation or performance, because such requirements unfairly derogate from the normal right or the obligation to pay at either delivery, installation or performance, and if the product complies with the contract. Similarly, it may be considered to be unfair for consumers to be required to pre-pay for installation or other labour costs because consumers should only be required to pay for those costs at delivery, installation or performance, and if the product complies with the contract.

The unfairness arises for consumers because unless a substantial amount is unpaid, their bargaining power in requiring suppliers to rectify defects etc, without recourse to litigation, can be severely reduced. Further, excessive deposits or pre-payments leave consumers unduly vulnerable to being out of pocket if the suppliers become bankrupt before delivery/installation/performance.

Example

‘50% deposit to be paid before work can commence. Payment of the balance is due and payable upon notification by [the supplier] that the window coverings are available for installation. Title for these goods will not pass to the purchaser until full payment has been received.’

In the absence of this sort of term, the obligation to pay the balance of the price would not arise at common law and, in some cases, under relevant legislation until the goods were installed, at which point title passes. Alternatively, there are circumstances, such as under section 35 of the Goods Act 1958 (Vic), where installation of the goods and payment of the balance of the price are concurrent conditions, and the obligation to pay the balance of the price would not arise until installation.

Terms allowing suppliers to retain, debit or set off disputed amounts

Terms allowing suppliers to retain amounts paid by consumers to defray unpaid amounts, or to debit consumers’ accounts for unpaid amounts, or otherwise to set off amounts owed by consumers against amounts owed to consumers, are common.

While such terms are unremarkable when applied to amounts that are indisputably owed, this is not the case when amounts allegedly owed by consumers are genuinely in dispute. In permitting a supplier to retain, debit or set off a disputed amount, such terms effectively permit the supplier to decide that it has not breached the contract, as claimed by the consumer, allowing the supplier unilaterally to determine whether the contract has been breached or to interpret its meaning.

Such terms can have the effect of being unfair if they do not make reasonable allowance for:

- amounts genuinely in dispute (either the amount allegedly owed by the consumer or an amount alleged to be owed by the supplier); or

- genuine disputes over the adequacy of the performance of the contract. For instance, a reasonable dispute-resolution process, including the holding of disputed amounts in trust or the suspension of the right to set off or debit pending the outcome of the process could be provided.

Examples

‘You must pay us without any set-off, counter-claim or deduction. ... We can pay you amounts we owe you by deducting them from amounts you owe us.’

‘The Debtor must not deduct anything from any such payments. This means the Debtor cannot deduct anything that the Debtor claims the Credit Provider owes or could owe in the future to the Debtor.’

Terms mandating arbitration of disputes or otherwise inhibiting access to courts or tribunals

Some existing consumer laws include provisions that prohibit the use of terms which purport to limit or prevent consumers from exercising their right to take legal action. Terms requiring disputes to be privately arbitrated instead of, or before, litigation in a court or tribunal (including terms allowing suppliers to nominate arbitration) can have that object or effect, and may be particularly unfair where consumers are required to pay their portion of the arbitrator’s costs as a condition of the arbitration. Such terms will, in many cases, effectively preclude consumers from any dispute resolution process.

Example

In the event of any dispute as to compensation, the dispute shall be settled by an arbitrator who shall be a person mutually agreed upon by the parties.

68 Section 32X(k) of the Victorian FTA refers to terms that have the object or effect of limiting consumers’ rights to sue suppliers.
CHAPTER 7
AGREED REFORMS TO CONSUMER LAW ENFORCEMENT POWERS

The proposed changes to consumer law enforcement powers

In the detailed proposals for the Australian Consumer Law, MCCA proposed to COAG, and COAG agreed, that enforcement of the law will be shared between the ACCC and the state and territory offices of fair trading, supported by formal agreements between these regulators that cover arrangements for communication between them and the coordination of their activities. All enforcement arrangements will be reviewed by COAG within seven years after the commencement of the Australian Consumer Law.

At the national level, ASIC will have primary responsibility for the enforcement of consumer laws relating to financial services, although the States and Territories will retain enforcement powers in this area, and ASIC will assume primary responsibility for enforcing national consumer credit laws.

The Australian Consumer Law will include the full range of penalties, enforcement powers and consumer remedies currently available in the TPA, with appropriate modifications to reflect the respective powers of national and state and territory regulators and the differing law enforcement and court systems in place around the country. A description of these powers is set out in Chapter 4 above.

COAG has agreed that these powers should be extended, based on MCCA’s detailed reform proposals, and that the Australian Consumer Law will include provisions covering:

• civil pecuniary penalties and disqualification orders;

• substantiation notices;

• availability of redress for non-parties to proceedings;

• public warning powers; and

• infringement notices, to the extent permitted by relevant Commonwealth and state and territory laws and policies.

These reforms are described in more detail below.

Civil pecuniary penalties and disqualification orders

In November 2007, MCCA endorsed a report which identified the need for additional enforcement tools in relation to consumer law breaches: civil penalties, including civil pecuniary penalties and disqualification orders. These will augment the current range of criminal sanctions and civil remedies and be implemented as part of COAG’s agreement to introduce an Australian Consumer Law.

Current consumer law penalties

Breaches of Part V of the TPA and the state and territory FTAs, all of which protect consumers from unfair trading practices, are currently enforced both through criminal sanctions and civil remedies. Part 2 of the ASIC Act largely mirrors the TPA’s consumer protection provisions in relation to financial services. The enforcement structure is designed to deter future contraventions of the law by potential offenders; punish parties engaging in serious or habitual contraventions; provide redress for loss or damage from prohibited conduct; and stop prohibited conduct quickly to limit ongoing consumer detriment.

The criminal sanctions in the TPA, ASIC Act and FTAs punish and deter culpable conduct by imposing fines on corporate and individual offenders. In some cases, the FTAs also provide for the imprisonment of offenders in certain circumstances. Convictions are recorded, but custodial sentences are not generally available under the ASIC Act and not available at all under the TPA for consumer law breaches (although imprisonment can be imposed as a sanction in relation to failure to comply with court orders and certain enforcement powers of the ACCC).

The personal, social and financial consequences of a criminal conviction can be serious for the offender. Criminal sanctions are imposed through criminal processes, which do not typically allow for outcomes such as injunctions or judgments for damages, and require the high standard of proof of beyond reasonable doubt to be met. The agreement of the relevant DPP is often required before a criminal prosecution is undertaken.

Civil remedies available in the TPA, ASIC Act and FTAs include injunctions, corrective advertising, restitution and other compensation orders. FTAs also include a range of other penalties including ‘cease trading’ orders. They provide a rapid means of stopping continued illegal conduct and compensating consumers for losses suffered as a result, and the illegality of the conduct is determined according to the civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities. However, there are limits on the effectiveness of the current range of civil remedies, such as limits on the availability of representative actions. Since these remedies are limited to the losses suffered or gains made through illegal conduct, they may not always provide an effective deterrent to breaches of the consumer law.

Why do we need civil penalties and disqualification orders?

The lack of civil penalties for enforcement of consumer law both nationally and in the States and Territories is a significant gap in the range of enforcement options available to consumer

70 PC 2008 Rec. 10.1; MCCA Communiqué 15 August 2008.

71 Section 62(2A) of the NSW FTA provides for a term of no more than three years’ imprisonment for a person convicted of a second or subsequent offence against Part 5 of FTA (NSW), which deals with unfair practices.

72 At the Commonwealth level all criminal prosecutions are brought by the Director of Public Prosecutions after being briefed by the relevant enforcement agency. The situation may differ in respect of other jurisdictions.
regulators. While criminal sanctions provide an important deterrent against the most serious misconduct, and civil remedies can achieve timely outcomes for consumers, there is a large range of conduct which could be more proportionately penalised through civil penalties. These would also provide a greater deterrent effect through their more straightforward judicial application and they can be imposed in a more timely manner than would be the case in relation to criminal sanctions.

Moreover, at present the consumer law enforcement agencies are unable to obtain compensation for consumers when criminal action alone is brought. If a matter is serious enough to warrant a penalty, the consumer law enforcement agency must institute both civil and criminal proceedings in order to secure any type of compensation. Civil penalties would provide an alternative to this duplicative process, and provide timely and satisfactory resolutions to instances of illegal conduct which do not call for criminal sanction.

Civil penalties are a feature of other Commonwealth regulatory regimes, including the restrictive trade practices provisions in Part IV of the TPA and the ASIC Act. They are also available to state and territory agencies, and all Australian jurisdictions have indicated their willingness to make appropriate amendments to their FTAs to ensure the smooth introduction of a civil penalty regime for consumer law.

What are civil pecuniary penalties?

Civil pecuniary penalties are imposed by the courts according to civil standard of proof. As such, a matter brought to the court seeking a civil pecuniary penalty is not subject to criminal standard of proof, but the lower standard of proof of ‘on the balance of probabilities’ (though the court will construe the standard more strictly the higher the penalty sought).73

Generally speaking, civil proceedings require a lesser commitment of resources than is required in relation to criminal proceedings, where, understandably, the consequences for the defendant are much graver. They also would give the relevant enforcement agencies more flexibility in how they respond to illegal conduct, by providing an intermediate penalty which may better reflect the seriousness of the conduct engaged in than either a criminal sanction or a civil remedy.

What are disqualification orders?

Disqualification orders effectively ban or restrict individuals from participating in specific activities for specific periods of time, including managing corporations or undertaking specific business conduct. They can carry serious personal and financial consequences for the individuals concerned by preventing them from doing certain things. They therefore provide a serious deterrent for individuals from engaging in illegal conduct, but do not impose the graver consequences of a criminal conviction.

Disqualification orders would be made available for breaches of the consumer protection provisions where a civil pecuniary penalty is imposed, as well as in respect of breaches where a criminal sanction is imposed. This amendment would bring the consumer law into line with amendments made to the TPA in 2006 providing for disqualification orders in relation to breaches of the restrictive trade practices provisions.

The proposed reforms

The Australian Consumer Law will set out a series of generic consumer protections based on those currently in the TPA. For the purposes of this discussion, references to provisions in the TPA also include references to the equivalent provisions in the FTAs.

The current enforcement powers in the TPA and the ASIC Act will be augmented by the inclusion of civil pecuniary penalties which would apply to the consumer protection provisions of the Australian Consumer Law based on those provisions in Parts V and IVA of the TPA. Those consumer protection provisions of Part V of the TPA which already have criminal sanctions available will also have civil pecuniary penalties. Those provisions that do not have criminal sanctions, including the general prohibition on misleading and deceptive conduct in section 52 of the TPA, will not have civil pecuniary penalties available and civil remedies will remain as the principal means of enforcing these provisions.

Civil pecuniary penalties would not exceed the current level of monetary criminal sanctions in the TPA: 10,000 penalty units (currently $1.1 million) for corporations and 2,000 penalty units (currently $220,000) for individuals.

Disqualification orders would be limited, in the case of the Commonwealth law, to the management of corporations or the undertaking of specific activities in connection with the management of a corporation. However, in respect of the version of the Australian Consumer Law applied in the States and Territories, a more expansive approach may be adopted, permitting orders to be made to ban specific forms of conduct by named individuals and unincorporated entities.

New enforcement powers

The Australian Consumer Law will include a range of new enforcement powers for consumer regulators. These powers were considered in MCCA’s September 2005 discussion paper ‘Civil penalties for Australia’s consumer protection provisions’74 and its November 2007 decision to introduce national provisions in this regard.

Substantiation notices

The Australian Consumer Law will include a power for consumer regulators to issue substantiation notices.

A substantiation notice requires a supplier to provide a consumer regulator with a basis for representations that it makes regarding its supply of goods and services (or in relation to the sale or grant of interest in land). The PC observed that substantiation notices would provide

74 MCCA (September 2005) Civil penalties for Australia’s consumer protection provisions: A discussion paper consumer regulators with an additional regulatory tool to deal with increasingly complex representations made in the course of trade and commerce.\textsuperscript{75}

At the national level, the ACCC already has investigative powers under the TPA to obtain documents and evidence in relation to matters it suspects may constitute breaches of the Act. However, the Federal Court has held that the ACCC requires some factual basis for forming the opinion that there may be a breach of the Act.\textsuperscript{76} The ACCC has indicated that this threshold may in some cases prevent it from obtaining information about dubious public claims by traders, in order to determine whether any breach is likely to have occurred. Some state regulators have similar powers, for example, section 106A of the Victorian FTA; section 23A of the NSW FTA; or section 88B of the Queensland FTA.

A substantiation notice would require a person or business to which it was issued to respond to a notice within a specified time and impose specific requirements about the nature of the information which is to be provided under the notice (for example, that it is not false or misleading or that the response is not frivolous or vexatious). The provision would include requirements that the notice must include certain information to enable the business to understand what is required of it.

Failure to comply with a substantiation notice either at all or in respect of the manner in which a response is provided would have consequences for the recipient. These could include enforcement action in relation to the conduct that has given rise to the notice being issued and other penalties available under the Australian Consumer Law.\textsuperscript{77} The final form of this power is yet to be determined.

Public warning powers

The Australian Consumer Law will include a new nationally consistent ‘public warning’ power (often called a ‘naming and shaming’ power). The final form of this power is yet to be determined.

Typically, public warnings are issued to inform the public of potentially harmful conduct taking place in the very short term. Those who are the subject of such warnings are usually ‘fly by night’ operators, itinerant traders and financial, investment and property spruikers and advisors who often move across state and territory borders.

All but one of the States and Territories has a form of public warning power, which is generally confined to specific subject matters and is subject to a public interest test. These powers are subject to specific protocols which govern their use. At present, there is no public warning power in the TPA. However, the ACCC does publicise enforcement actions and penalties, both as a consequence of court orders being made and where a business has entered into an undertaking under section 87B of the TPA.

<td>Section 162A Fair Trading Act 1999&lt;br&gt;Public Warning Statements&lt;br&gt;If satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so, the Minister or Director of CAV may issue a public warning in respect of unsatisfactory goods and services, unfair business practices and other matters adversely affecting persons acquiring goods and services. The power grants no immunity to the Crown.&lt;br&gt;A public warning statement may be issued:&lt;br&gt;- by the Minister during proceedings in Parliament&lt;br&gt;- by the Minister, Director or member of CAV staff in a statement made to the media in a public forum&lt;br&gt;- by the Director in the annual report to the Minister in accordance with section 102 of the FTA&lt;br&gt;- by the Minister or the Director pursuant to section 162A of the Victorian FTA&lt;br&gt;- by the Director or member of staff in a Consumer Affairs Victoria’s publication, newspaper advertisement or notice.&lt;br&gt;In practice, public warnings are usually published on the CAV website and also announced to the media.&lt;br&gt;Note: Section 162A must be distinguished from Warning Notices issued under section 58 of the Victorian FTA:&lt;br&gt;Section 58 notices contain information about unsafe goods or services which are under investigation to determine whether they can cause injury and/or information about the possible risks posed by those goods or services. In practice, these notices are usually in relation to product safety issues.&lt;br&gt;Section 162A public warning statements are used to provide an early warning to consumers of unfair practices and traders. For example, traders can operate under assumed names and be difficult to identify for legal proceeding, or the timing of legal proceeding may leave consumers open to further detriment. In these circumstances, a public notice is often the only timely and effective approach to attempt to reduce further detriment.</td>
<td>Under CAV’s Compliance and Enforcement Policy, a trader may only be named in a s.162A Public Warning Statement if the following criteria are satisfied:&lt;br&gt;- Publicly naming a trader is justified in the public interest.&lt;br&gt;- The conduct poses actual or likely, imminent personal injury or financial or other loss to members of the public.&lt;br&gt;- The conduct is deceptive, unethical, unfair or improper.&lt;br&gt;- On available evidence, a prima facie breach has occurred.&lt;br&gt;- The alleged offender has been the subject of previous enforcement action and has established a similar business, or one where similar losses could be expected.&lt;br&gt;- The alleged offender has avoided or rejected attempts to investigate and resolve consumer complaints.&lt;br&gt;The criteria are not exhaustive and are designed to guide thinking in deciding the appropriate enforcement action. Businesses are protected from the misuse of this provision:&lt;br&gt;First, there is a public interest test — the power can only be used when it is in the public interest to do so.&lt;br&gt;Second, there is no immunity for the Crown, and thus the business or individual in question has all the normal legal rights they would have regarding public statements made about them. High priority matters:&lt;br&gt;The type of factors which may involve a risk to the public interest are also those which are classified as a high priority for enforcement action because, amongst other things:&lt;br&gt;- a serious prima facie breach of administered legislation has occurred&lt;br&gt;- the alleged conduct appears systemic, for example, it affects many consumers and may cause significant detriment&lt;br&gt;- the alleged conduct may endanger the health and safety of a member of the public&lt;br&gt;- there is a need to act quickly to stop or restrain the conduct to avoid significant consumer detriment&lt;br&gt;- it is desirable to send a clear signal to the industry that the conduct engaged in is unacceptable</td>

| QLD             | Sections 109(1)(b) and 110 Fair Trading Act 1989
The power exists by virtue of a limitation of liability on the Crown for making of any disclosure by the Minister or Commissioner in relation to the supply or quality of goods and services, business reputation or the contravention or enforcement of the Queensland FTA, where the Minister or Commissioner is satisfied in good faith that it is in the public interest to do so. | The OFT does not use ‘public warnings’ as a punishment (i.e., for its direct ‘reputational impact’). Public warnings are only used where there is a high likelihood of ongoing and significant consumer detriment. |
| WA              | Sections 17 and 25 Consumer Affairs Act 1971
The Commissioner may issue a public warning in respect of unsatisfactory goods and services, unfair business practices and other matters adversely affecting persons acquiring goods and services. The Commissioner must apply a public interest test (section 17(3) CAA (WA)). The Commissioner has immunity under section 25 CAA (WA). | WA Department of Commerce has published a policy specifically laying down an operational procedure for the agency to follow in issuing public warnings.
A trader whose reputation is injured as a result of being named by the Department can bring an action for defamation to recover compensation for any loss suffered as a result of any defamatory statement.
The naming of traders in media releases and other non-parliamentary circumstances will only be protected in an action for defamation if the statement can be proven to be true, or if the defence of qualified privilege applies. The circumstances in which qualified privilege applies vary and need to be assessed on a case-by-case basis. In general, however, there will be a need to show that exceptional circumstances exist.
The policy puts procedures and guidelines in place that help ensure that traders are named only where the truth of allegations against them is established, and/or exceptional circumstances exist.
The policy sets out a detailed checklist of questions and steps that must be undertaken prior to action being undertaken.
Adherence to the policy is intended to also help balance the risks for the public from unfair and illegal practices of traders, and the need to safeguard against traders’ reputations being unjustifiably damaged. |

In developing a common national public warning power, SCOCA will consider:

- the need for national consistency of a public warning power, which could provide business certainty that consistent powers exist across all jurisdictions, subject to similar protocols governing their exercise;

- the circumstances in which such powers are used, particularly in the absence of some related action for a breach of the law which might be the subject of publicity;

- the potential ongoing impact on businesses that are the subject of warnings, as well as the potential for regulatory error. Appropriate safeguards would need to be developed to ensure that these powers were appropriately exercised, given the issues surrounding defamation and appropriate use;

- whether, as a matter of principle, it is appropriate to provide statutory immunity from legal action in relation to potentially defamatory or inaccurate statements made in a public warning. Not all jurisdictions currently have such immunity available to the person exercising the power; and

- the need to ensure coordination of action between consumer regulators in relation to conduct that occurs in more than one jurisdiction.

Question

How can the interests of a business be safeguarded in the formal requirements for a national public warning power?

Infringement notices

The Australian Consumer Law will include a nationally consistent power for consumer regulators to issue infringement notices in relation to breaches of consumer protection provisions. This power will be sufficiently flexible to accommodate existing state and territory infringement notice powers and related administrative and court processes.78

A number of state and territory consumer regulators have the power to issue infringement (or penalty) notices in relation to a range of matters including both administrative breaches (concerning such issues as product safety, telemarketing, cooling-off and lay-by provisions)79 and substantive breaches of the relevant FTA (concerning such issues as, false representations and misleading conduct).80 At the national level, ASIC can issue infringement notices in respect of breaches of the Corporations Act 2001.

78 Currently, a number of approaches exist at the state and territory level in relation to the manner in which infringement notices are issued, including government-wide systems for their issuance and administration. The Australian, state and territory governments will resolve these matters and consult publicly on the agreed approach at the time the draft legislation is made available for public comment.

79 See section 64 NSW FTA, section 160A Victorian FTA (see also Fair Trading Regulations 1999 (Vic); see Schedule 2), section 73 WA FTA.

80 Fair Trading (Infringement Notices) Regulations 2006 (WA); see Schedule 1.
Failure to comply with an infringement notice may have consequences for the recipient including possible action by the regulator for the breach of the Law alleged.

New options for consumer redress

Non-party redress

A key objective of the consumer policy framework is to provide a range of redress options in response to large-scale consumer detriment. As part of the Australian Consumer Law, there will be a power for consumer regulators to seek orders from the court to seek redress for persons who are not parties to the particular action.

Concerns about non-party redress arose out of the Full Federal Court’s 2002 decision in Medibank Private Ltd v Cassidy (Medibank)[^81], where it was held that it was beyond the Court’s power under section 12GD of the ASIC Act (which is equivalent to section 80 of the TPA) to order a business to provide redress to non-parties to a proceeding. Special leave to appeal this decision to the High Court was refused. Prior to Medibank, it was understood that section 12GD of the ASIC Act (and section 80 of the TPA) did allow for redress for non-parties.

While a small number of consumers may bring an action and obtain redress under section 87 of the TPA, when large numbers of consumers are involved this can be a difficult, time-consuming, expensive and inefficient process. The decision in Medibank limits the effectiveness of the TPA in providing redress to large numbers of consumers. This also limits the ACCC’s ability to seek redress on behalf of foreign consumers, in accordance with the OECD’s Guidelines for Protecting Consumers from Fraudulent and Deceptive Commercial Practices Across Borders.[^82]

A new non-party redress power will improve the ability of the courts to respond to situations where a large number of consumers are affected by a contravention of the consumer law. The circumstances of the case, including the number of parties involved, would determine the appropriateness of awarding redress to non-parties.

Redress for non-parties should be available when a large number of consumers suffer similar, identifiable detriment. This redress could take a number of forms, including a refund or an enforceable undertaking to honour representations that were made. The injunction should match the type of detriment suffered by the consumer. However, constitutional issues may arise at the Commonwealth level if a court of federal jurisdiction ordered compensation or damages to other non-parties. As such, a provision of this nature would need to be carefully drafted to take account of this.

CHAPTER 8
A NATIONAL REGULATORY REGIME FOR PRODUCT SAFETY

In May 2008, MCCA agreed to a new model for the regulation of product safety in Australia. This model was endorsed by COAG at its July 2008 meeting. The new model will be underpinned by national application legislation.

The new model will substantially simplify and streamline product safety regulation in Australia. Australia currently has a product safety regulatory system with duplicative national and state/territory responsibilities. National consumer product safety regulation is set out in the TPA and generally applies to activities undertaken by corporations, in respect of goods traded across state and territory borders, or which are traded internationally (including imported goods). Each State and Territory has its own product safety laws, which generally apply to goods traded within each State and Territory’s borders and also cover activities undertaken by sole traders and unincorporated businesses. A state or territory law may cover the activities of corporations, but only to the extent that they are not inconsistent with Commonwealth laws.

The agreed reforms

The new product safety legislative regime will be enforced by the ACCC and the state and territory consumer regulators.

The ACCC will be responsible for recommending the making of permanent bans to the Australian Government Minister for Competition Policy and Consumer Affairs. State and territory governments will be able to impose temporary bans on products within their own jurisdiction of no more than 60 days' duration. Any decision to extend a temporary ban is a matter for the Australian Government Minister to determine at his discretion. Extensions to interim bans may be for an initial period of 30 days and an additional period of 30 days. Any State or Territory can refer the development of a proposed ban or standard to the ACCC.

The ACCC, once notified of an intention to implement an interim ban or having received a proposal for a permanent ban or standard, may make its own assessment of the need for a permanent ban or standard. The ACCC will communicate its assessment to the Australian Government Minister and to MCCA. The ACCC will report to MCCA (and the Australian Parliament, as is required of Australian Government bodies) on referrals for the development of permanent bans or standards.

The reformed product safety legislative and regulatory system will be underpinned by two fundamental elements:

- the introduction of the principal legislation to the new product safety regulatory system is subject to unanimous approval of all Australian governments; and

- the administration and ongoing maintenance of the regulatory model being underpinned by the Inter-Governmental Agreement for the Australian Consumer Law.

- State and territory enforcement bodies

Local Enforcement

Imposing interim product bans within their State or Territory.

Implementation of the product safety reforms

Currently, Australia’s national product safety provisions are set out in Division 1A of Part V of the TPA and the associated offence provisions in Division 3 of Part VC of the TPA. Each State and Territory has its own product safety laws.

The Australian Consumer Law will include new product safety provisions which will be applied in each Australian jurisdiction through application legislation. These new provisions will reflect the agreed consumer product safety reforms. With the exception of interim bans made by the States and Territories, amendments to the application law (including regulations) would automatically be replicated in each jurisdiction.

Standards

- Mandatory consumer product standards for a particular class of goods may be made by regulation. There are two types of mandatory product standards: safety standards and information standards. Mandatory standards would continue to be based on existing voluntary Australia/New Zealand published standards or international standards, where appropriate.

- Safety standards require goods to comply with particular performance, composition, contents, methods of manufacture or processing, design, construction, finish or packaging rules; for example, construction of toys for children under three years of age.

Recalls

- The Minister can also order the compulsory recall of a product if the goods will or may cause injury and where it appears the supplier has not taken satisfactory action to prevent the goods causing injury to any person.

- Suppliers conducting voluntary recalls would be required to notify the Australian Government Minister only. The Commonwealth will coordinate all recalls at a national level. The ACCC would then pass details to all jurisdictions.

- Once a decision to issue a ban or compulsory recall is taken, the ACCC is currently required to give suppliers an opportunity to provide additional information through a conference process. After hearing the additional information, the ACCC may recommend to the Minister that the ban or recall remain in force or be revoked or amended.

Enforcement issues

- MCCA has agreed that the Australian Government will transfer the ACCC’s ability to hold conferences in respect of bans and recalls to another independent review body.

- Currently, actions for breaches of the product safety provisions of the TPA may be taken by any party (other than the ACCC) in the Federal Court or the Federal Magistrates Court. The ACCC may instigate actions in the Federal Court.

- Currently, product safety offences are strict liability offences under Commonwealth law. Both civil remedies and criminal offence provisions exist for breaches of the product safety provisions. Consideration is being given to whether a civil penalty regime should be implemented that would apply to product safety.

- Mutual recognition arrangements will continue to apply in accordance with the national legislative Mutual Recognition Agreement.
Part III

Consumer law reforms based on best practice in existing state and territory laws
CHAPTER 9
SUGGESTED REFORMS BASED ON BEST PRACTICE IN STATE AND TERRITORY LAWS

The PC recommended that the consumer protection provisions of the TPA, in forming the basis of the Australian Consumer Law, be augmented or modified by reference to best practice in existing state and territory laws, where it is generally agreed that the TPA is not adequate. It identified some areas of regulation, such as door-to-door sales and lay-by sales, which could benefit from this. This recommendation was included in MCCA’s detailed proposals for reforms to the consumer policy framework, as accepted by COAG on 2 October 2008.

COAG reform processes to harmonise certain state and territory
consumer laws

COAG has, in recent years, embarked on a number of reform processes to harmonise laws affecting consumers. These fall outside of the Australian Consumer Law development process and include:

• trade measurement laws, which are in the process of being referred to the Commonwealth and regulated under a single national scheme by the National Measurement Institute;

• personal property securities, where the Australian Government, in cooperation with the States and Territories, is pursuing reforms to Australia’s personal property securities
(PPS) law and practice which will improve Australia’s business laws and to create a more competitive economy;

• national business names registration, in which the Commonwealth and the States and Territories are developing a new system to allow prospective businesses will be able to apply and pay for a national business name online through a single application covering both a business name and Australian Business Number (ABN);

• industry-specific legislation, in respect of which, on 3 July 2008, COAG agreed a process for reviewing industry-specific regulation across all Australian jurisdictions with a view to removing differences where possible; and

• occupational licensing, in respect of which, on 3 July 2008, COAG has also agreed to develop a national trade licensing system that will remove inconsistencies across state borders and allow for a much more mobile workforce.

83 PC 2008 Rec. 4.1.
84 The National Measurement Amendment Act 2008 passed through Parliament last year and received Royal assent on 8 December 2008. This Act provides the legislative basis for the Commonwealth, through NMI, to establish and operate a single national system of trade measurement from 1 July 2010.
85 On 13 November 2008, the draft Personal Property Securities Bill 2008 was referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for inquiry and report.
Suggested reforms

As part of the process for developing the policy basis for the Australian Consumer Law, States and Territories, through SCOCA, have made suggestions for provisions to augment or modify the consumer protection provisions of the TPA, based on best practice in state and territory laws. These suggestions, along with the options for their implementation, are set out in Chapters 10 and 11, along with questions about each of them.\(^{86}\)

In making these suggestions, the States and Territories have identified two approaches to augment or modify the existing provisions of the TPA:

- harmonising existing differences in state and territory laws to develop a uniform national legislative approach (for example, in relation to door-to-door sales or telemarketing); and
- considering whether a current TPA provision requires updating to take account of developments in the market or new regulatory approaches.

The States and Territories, in making these suggestions, have drawn on their experience in dealing with consumer protection at a local level, which has led to legislative and policy developments to deal with specific issues and concerns that may not have translated to the national level.

The status of the suggested reforms

The suggested reforms set out in Chapters 10 and 11 have not yet been agreed by the Australian Government or the governments of the States and Territories. They are set out in this document for the purposes of obtaining the preliminary views of stakeholders. The development process for the Australian Consumer Law will include opportunities for further consultation on draft legislative provisions as they are made ready.

Other potential reforms

SCOCA welcomes views on other potential reforms based on best practice in existing state and territory consumer laws, which may not be set out in this paper.

In setting out these suggestions, SCOCA notes that they will not have been the subject of detailed scrutiny through the PC’s review process. Accordingly, it is important that suggestions should be considered in the light of the principles of best practice regulation (see below).

The basis for consideration of suggested reforms

In its review of Australia’s consumer policy framework, the PC considered a range of specific changes to the TPA and, in doing so, considered the regulatory impact of those issues,

---

86 In preparing Chapters 10 and 11, extensive reference has been made to the Comparison of Generic Consumer Protection Legislation commissioned by the PC from Professors Stephen Corones and Sharon Christensen, QUT (Corones & Christensen 2007) and the Discussion Paper on implementation of the Productivity Commission’s recommendations regarding a new national generic consumer law and related matters commissioned by Victoria (on behalf the States and Territories) from Sitesh Bhojani (Bhojani 2008). including an assessment of the consumer detriment being addressed, the impact on business and the potential benefits of reform.

The policy position of the Australian Government

In considering these proposals, the Australian Government takes the view that potential reforms should be considered subject to an appropriate regulatory impact assessment, as required by COAG.

Best practice regulation

A regulatory impact assessment has not been undertaken in relation to the proposals that are covered in Chapters 10 and 11, and they will need to satisfy the COAG’s regulatory impact assessment requirements in order to be included in the Australian Consumer Law. Therefore, when considering specific proposals the following issues need to be considered:

- the nature of the problem facing consumers;
- the appropriate policy response to address these consumer issues, including non-regulatory approaches;
- what benefits may result from the change and whether these can be quantified; and
- whether the proposed change is appropriate for inclusion in a law which applies generic consumer protections on an economy-wide basis.

Questions

Are there reforms other than those covered in Chapters 10 and 11 that could be included in the Australian Consumer Law, based on existing best practice in existing state and territory laws? In making a suggestion, please address the following questions:

- What is the nature of the problem facing consumers that the suggested reform will address?
- What is the appropriate policy response to address these consumer issues, including non-regulatory approaches?
- What benefits would result from this change and can these be quantified?
- Is the suggested change appropriate for inclusion in a law which applies generic consumer protections on an economy-wide basis?
CHAPTER 10
SUGGESTED REFORMS TO DEFINITIONS

Definitions in the Australian Consumer Law
The current consumer protection provisions of the TPA and the FTAs use a range of relevant definitions, which have the effect of limiting the application of the specific Act to particular transactions and behaviour. These definitions will equally determine the application and scope of the Australian Consumer Law.

The definition of ‘consumer’
The definition of ‘consumer’ will determine the application and scope of the consumer protection provisions of the Australian Consumer Law. It determines the application of many, but not all, of the consumer protection provisions of the TPA and the FTAs to consumer transactions.

Despite the similar objectives of consumer laws across Australia, there are significant differences between jurisdictions in how a ‘consumer’ is defined for the purposes of consumer protection under the TPA, ASIC Act and FTAs.

The two principal criteria used to define categories of consumers between jurisdictions are whether the goods or services are acquired for personal and domestic or business use, or the value of the goods or services purchased (most jurisdictions use $40,000 as the upper threshold).87 The term is defined differently again under the ASIC Act in relation to investors.88 These inconsistencies can create uncertainty for consumers and create the potential for traders, particularly in respect of distance transactions, to use the law of the jurisdiction where a ‘consumer’ is most restrictively defined.

Operation of the definition of ‘consumer’ in the TPA
Currently, the definition of ‘consumer’ in the TPA applies in respect of:

• the unconscionable conduct provisions (Part IVA);

• certain provisions in the unfair practices provisions (Division 1, Part V); and

• the implied conditions and warranties provisions (Division 2, Part V).

87 Corones & Christensen 2007 39-61.
88 See section 12BC of the ASIC Act.
The approaches used in the TPA and in the States and Territories

The TPA defines a ‘consumer’ as:

- a buyer (who is either an individual or a corporation) of any kind of goods or services with a price of no more than $40,000, or

- if the price of the goods and services is more than $40,000, they were of a kind ordinarily acquired for personal, domestic or household use or consumption, or the goods consisted of a commercial road vehicle.

The TPA’s approach to the monetary threshold is used in the Queensland, Tasmanian and Western Australian FTAs. The New South Wales, Northern Territory and ACT FTAs do not impose a monetary threshold on the definition of ‘consumer’.

Victoria applies both approaches. It does not use a monetary threshold for determining a ‘consumer’ for the purposes of safety and information standards, door-to-door sales, telemarketing, ‘non-contact’ sales, but does require that the goods or services acquired be ordinarily of a kind acquired for personal, domestic or household use or purposes. No threshold applies in respect of the provisions on unconscionable conduct or unfair contracts under the Victorian FTA, but a monetary threshold of $40,000 does apply in relation to implied conditions and warranties. The Victorian FTA also uses a definition of ‘consumer contract’, which is used to limit the application of provisions to referral selling and unfair contract terms.

The definitions of ‘consumer’ used in the TPA and the FTAs are set out in Attachment C.

Resupply exclusion

The definition of ‘consumer’ under the TPA also requires that a person should not acquire, or hold him or herself out as acquiring, goods, irrespective of their price, for the purpose of resupply or for the purpose of using them up or transforming them, in trade or commerce, in the course of a process of manufacture or of repairing or treating other goods or fixtures on land. This means that goods used by businesses that fall outside these conditions may be covered by the TPA. Similarly, any services that are acquired by a business for $40,000 or less are also covered by the TPA. Furthermore, any services ordinarily of a kind acquired for personal, domestic or household use, even if acquired for a price of more than $40,000, may be covered by the TPA.

89 The term ‘commercial road vehicle’ is defined by section 4B of the TPA as meaning a vehicle or trailer acquired for use principally in the transport of goods on public roads.
90 These provisions also provide that the goods should not be supplied to a purchaser who is in the business of buying or supplying those types of goods, or to a body corporate.
91 Section 18 Victorian FTA.
92 Section 32U Victorian FTA.
93 See Director of Consumer Affairs Victoria v AAPT Ltd [2006] VCAT 1493, which concerned the acquisition of mobile phone services. It may also include the acquisition of an interest in real property in the course of trade and commerce under a contract, including insurance, consultancy or royalty agreements, but not employment or lease agreements. See also Crago v Multiquip Pty Limited (1998) ATPR 41-620.
The FTAs contain a similar exclusion on goods or services acquired for the purpose of resupply. However, the SA FTA differs slightly in its approach in that it does not exclude goods or services for resupply, but only those purchased by a person acting in the course of a business or in the course of setting up a business.

Issues to consider

Jurisdictional differences in the definition of ‘consumer’ mean that there are inconsistencies as to how consumer purchases are treated. Some jurisdictions include any person or corporation which purchases goods or services for any kind of ‘personal’ use. This can have an expansive meaning, for example, mobile phone services, and can, in the context of business consumers, include things used for business purposes, despite their ostensibly ‘personal’ nature. For example, in Victoria, a corporation which purchases goods and services will be a ‘consumer’ for the purposes of the implied warranties provisions and unfair practices provisions but the contract itself will not be a ‘consumer contract’ for other purposes.

Question

Should the scope of the TPA’s existing definition of ‘consumer’ be expanded to cover a wider range of circumstances, such as goods used in business contexts?

Moreover, in other parts of the TPA, small businesses and farming undertakings are treated either in the same way as, or in a substantially similar way to, individual consumers for the purposes of regulation, even through they may be undertaking business functions.

Question

Should a new definition of ‘consumer’ specifically deal with small businesses and farming undertakings?

Similarly, certain types of goods are treated as consumer purchases for the purposes of the definition, including ‘commercial vehicles’ in some circumstances, and consideration could be given to retaining this approach.

Question

Should a new definition of ‘consumer’ cover commercial vehicles or vehicles purchased for a predominately commercial purpose?

The monetary threshold of $40,000 has been in place since 1995, without change, and consideration could be given to changing the threshold. Inflation would have increased this figure to more than $54,000 in 2007.\(^{94}\) Furthermore, there is the question of whether such a threshold is needed. For example, a distinction may more usefully be drawn in relation to purchases made for business purposes and those made for personal, domestic or household purposes.

Question

Should a new definition of ‘consumer’ retain the monetary limit of $40,000 or should the limit be increased? If it were increased, what would be an appropriate amount?

The increasing availability of goods with multiple uses may mean that certain business consumers (for example, sole traders and small partnerships) should receive consumer protections for ‘business goods’, where these are used for a ‘personal use’. Consideration could be given to whether the definition of ‘consumer’ should be widened to include:

- the purchase of business goods or services for business purposes, other than where the goods are resupplied; and/or
- business consumers or corporations purchasing consumer goods for business purposes.

Extending the definition of ‘consumer’ in this way may raise parallel issues about whether other key definitions that will be used in the Australian Consumer Law should be widened in a similar way. For example, in some jurisdictions ‘trade and commerce’ is defined, and that definition could be amended to include ‘any business or professional activity’.95

Questions

Should a new definition of ‘consumer’ exclude any purchases for business purposes, regardless of the existence of monetary limits? Alternatively, should business consumers be entitled to protections available under the Australian Consumer Law, such as implied conditions and warranties?

Should a new definition retain the exclusion in relation to ‘resupply’?

Are there other approaches to the way that ‘consumer’ can be defined?

Other definitions

The current consumer protection provisions of the TPA contain a wide range of relevant definitions, and consideration could be given to the effectiveness of these definitions as part of this reform process.

Question

Are there any other definitions currently used in the TPA in relation to consumer protection issues that require modification to improve their operation?

95 As in section 4 of the NSW FTA.
CHAPTER 11
SUGGESTED REFORMS TO PROVISIONS DEALING WITH UNFAIR PRACTICES

The Australian Consumer Law will include provisions based on Divisions 1 and 1AAA of Part V of the TPA, which address a range of unfair practices in consumer transactions. These divisions set out both general prohibitions, such as the prohibition on misleading and deceptive conduct in section 52 of the TPA, as well as more specific provisions addressing particular conduct that is considered to be wrong in all situations, such as the ban on pyramid selling in Division 1AAA.

The States and Territories, as part of SCOCA’s policy development process for the Australian Consumer Law, have made a range of suggestions to augment or modify the current provisions of the TPA. These suggestions are grouped into two broad categories, which are set out below:

- suggestions to harmonise existing state and territory laws to develop a uniform national legislative approach; and
- suggestions to update a current TPA provision to take account of developments in the market or new regulatory approaches.

Suggested reforms designed to achieve national consistency

Door-to-door trading and telemarketing

All States and Territories regulate door-to-door sales and telemarketing practices and the PC suggested that these were areas in which national harmonisation could be pursued.96

As door-to-door and telemarketing sales calls are largely unsolicited, regulation aims to provide greater protection to consumers than they would receive when they make purchases in other retail contexts, on the basis that the consumer may be the subject of actual or perceived pressure and may not have the opportunity to compare alternative offers.

Door-to-door trading

Each State and Territory regulates door-to-door trading. Door-to-door trading generally refers to a contract for the supply of goods or services made between a purchaser and supplier at premises which are not the business premises of the supplier. What constitutes ‘other than the business premises of the supplier’ is specifically defined in some state and 96 These areas were also identified by the House of Representatives Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in its report Harmonisation of Legal Systems within Australia and between Australia and New Zealand (November 2006) in recommendation 16. territory laws\textsuperscript{97} but not in others\textsuperscript{98}, meaning that a sale made in one State or Territory may not necessarily be covered by door-to-door trading laws in another.

Existing state and territory laws have common features, namely:

- door-to-door sales calls are unsolicited;
- there are prescribed formal requirements relating to transactions arising from calls;
- calls are not to be made outside prescribed calling hours;
- contracts entered into as a result of a call are subject to a cooling-off period, additional cancellation rights and procedures for effecting cancellation;
- there are a range of exemptions and exclusions that apply; and
- they impose obligations on sellers, with which they must comply in order for a door-to-door sale to be validly completed.

Some state and territory laws have unique features:

- Victoria requires that where a consumer has cancelled a contract during the cooling-off period, a supplier is obliged not only to provide a refund, but also to return any goods traded in as part of the sale\textsuperscript{99}; and

- Queensland allows a dealer or supplier to apply to the Fair Trading Commissioner to have their door-to-door contract, or part of that contract, exempted from the operation of the door-to-door legislation either for a limited or indefinite period of time.\textsuperscript{100}

\textsuperscript{97} For example, see section 60 Victorian FTA.
\textsuperscript{98} For example, see section 40B NSW FTA.
\textsuperscript{99} Section 79 Victorian FTA.
\textsuperscript{100} Note that, on 2 December 2008, the Hon Kerry Shine MP, Attorney-General and Minister for Justice of the State of Queensland, introduced into the Queensland Parliament amendments to the Queensland FTA (contained in the \textit{Criminal Proceeds Confiscation and Other Acts Amendment Bill 2008}) which will mean the Queensland Government will no longer grant exemptions under section 71A of the Queensland FTA to companies allowing them to door knock between 6 pm and 8 pm.

Areas of divergence

Door-to-door sales provisions diverge on various points, due no doubt to the existence of eight separate regimes, each with their own jurisdiction-specific features. Key points of difference include:

- naming conventions (that is, ‘distance selling’ or ‘non-contact sales’);
- the definition of ‘away from trade or business premises’;
- formal requirements for constituting a door-to-door sale;
- the inclusion of a power to approve non-complying categories of sales;
- prohibited visiting hours and cooling-off periods;
- suppliers’ duties whilst negotiating door-to-door sales;
- prohibitions during the cooling-off period;
- additional grounds for cancellation outside the cooling-off period;
- cancellation procedures;
• obligations of purchasers and suppliers following cancellation during the cooling-off period;

• excluded contracts;

• penalty levels;

• prohibited actions, including waiver of consumer rights; and

• approaches to dealing with harassment and coercion.

Time for calling
A trader may not call on premises:

• in all jurisdictions, except Queensland and NSW, before 9.00 am and after 8.00 pm, on any day other than a Saturday, Sunday or public holiday, unless with prior consent. In Queensland, the prohibition applies from 6.00 pm instead of 8.00 pm. The NSW Act prohibits door-to-door sales visits on all days outside the hours of 9.00 am and 8.00 pm.

• in all jurisdictions, except the ACT and NSW, at all, on a Sunday or public holiday. In the ACT, the complete prohibition on calling only applies to Good Friday, Easter Sunday and Christmas Day.

• in all jurisdictions, except NSW, at all, on a Saturday before 9.00 am and after 5.00 pm.

Cooling-off periods
The most significant consumer protection relating to door-to-door sales contracts is the cooling-off period. A cooling-off period gives the consumer time to reconsider a decision that was made under pressure or hastily, and then allows the consumer to rescind the contract within a specified time. Cancellation of a contract can generally be done in writing, by fax or email. Typically, suppliers are required to provide consumers with specified information in the contract, and failure to do so can be an offence or lead to an extension of the cooling-off period.

While most States and Territories require a 10 day cooling-off period for door-to-door trading contracts, the NSW FTA specifies five days. The information requirements for advising consumers of their cooling-off rights also vary across jurisdictions.
International approaches

As part of the development of an overarching Consumer Rights Directive, the European Commission is currently proposing to revise the EU’s common rules on ‘distance and off-premises selling’. These changes will involve:

- extending and harmonising the withdrawal (or cooling-off) period for both distance and off-premises contracts to 14 calendar days;
- amending the information requirements (including introducing a standard withdrawal form); and
- setting out requirements for the exercise of the right of withdrawal by placing obligations on both the trader and consumer. For example, consumers who exercise their right of withdrawal will have to bear the direct costs of returning goods to the trader;
- extending the provisions to cover solicited visits; and
- removing the financial threshold at which the requirements of the Directive apply.

Questions

Do businesses operating in multiple jurisdictions incur additional compliance costs as a result of different door-to-door sales regulation? If so, please provide evidence of this.

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision regulating door-to-door sales? If so, having regard to the principles of best practice regulation, what aspects of current regulation should this provision reflect? What other approaches might be used?

Telemarketing

All States and Territories regulate telemarketing practices. In addition, the Australian Government regulates aspects of telemarketing through the ‘Do Not Call Register’. Telemarketing covers a range of practices, but the main conduct regulated is so-called ‘cold calling’, which is when traders and suppliers initiate contact by telephone with consumers with a view to supplying goods and services.

The primary aim of telemarketing regulation is to protect consumers who may be pressured to make purchases and, due to transactions taking place on the telephone, are unable to see the product or compare price and quality before purchasing.

NSW and Victoria regulate telemarketing practices either as part of or adjacent to the door-to-door trading provisions of their FTAs, on the basis that the business transaction is sought out or solicited by the trader in a similar way. These laws regulate the times at which calls may be made to consumers, the documents that the seller must provide and cooling-off periods before consumer contracts entered into as a consequence of a telemarketing call can be enforced. Victorian cooling-off period is similar to the uniform door-to-door sales provisions which still apply in most States and Territories. The NSW FTA provides for a cooling-off period of 5 days, in line with its door-to-door sales provision.

The ACT, Tasmania and Western Australia interpret ‘door-to-door trading’ as a trading practice by which a person goes from place to place or makes telephone calls, seeking out persons who may be prepared to enter, as consumers, into contracts for the supply of goods and services and that person then or subsequently enters into negotiations with those prospective customers with a view to the making of contracts.

Western Australia and Queensland’s consumer enforcement agencies also endorse compliance with the Australian Direct Marketing Association’s Code of Practice. South Australia is in the process of implementing new laws on telemarketing.

The Australian Government is responsible for the national Do Not Call Register (DNCR), which came into being in 2006. This provides consumers with the ability to register their telephone numbers on a central database, and businesses that contact a number on the DNCR may be the subject of financial penalties. There are exceptions for organisations operating in the public interest, such as government bodies, religious organisations, charitable institutions, political parties and independent members of parliament.

Once registered, the only circumstances in which a call may be made to a person on the DNCR is where the person has provided consent to be called by the business. The DCNR Regulations 2006 prescribe types of calls that are not considered to be telemarketing calls, and the circumstances in which a person is deemed the nominee of an account holder for the purpose of giving consent to receiving telemarketing calls. The DNCR Standards outline when telemarketing and research calls cannot be made, information that must be provided during a call, when calls must be terminated and the use of calling line identification (these requirements supersede any state and territory requirements).

Spam

The Commonwealth Spam Act 2003 regulates the sending of commercial electronic messages such as email or SMS to consumers. Under the Spam Act such messages can only be sent with the consent of the recipient and need to include a functional unsubscribe facility and accurate sender information. Some organisations such as government bodies, religious organisations, charitable institutions, political parties and educational institutional are exempt from the consent and unsubscribe requirements.

Do businesses operating in multiple jurisdictions incur additional compliance costs as a result of different telemarketing regulation? If so, please provide evidence of this.

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision regulating telemarketing? If so, which aspects of current regulation should this provision reflect? What other approaches might be used?

False and misleading representations

Section 53 of the TPA provides that a corporation must not, in trade or commerce, and in relation to the supply or possible supply of goods or services, or to the promotion of goods or services, make:

- false representations that:
  - goods are of a particular standard, quality, value, grade, composition, make or model, or have had a particular history or particular previous use, or that they are new;
  - services are of a particular standard, quality, value or grade;
– a particular person has agreed to acquire goods or services; or – goods or services have sponsorship, approval, performance characteristics, accessories, uses or benefits they do not have;

• false or misleading representations:
– with respect to the price of the goods or services;
– concerning the availability of facilities for the repair of goods or of spare parts for the goods;
– concerning the place of origin of the goods;
– concerning the need for any goods or services; or – concerning the existence, exclusion or effect of any condition, warranty, guarantee, right or remedy.

Section 53 applies to representations that relate to the supply or promotion of goods and services in all circumstances and in all sectors of the economy. Sections 53A (false representations in relation to land) and 53B (false representations in relation to employment) regulate transactions involving land and employment, due to concerns that these are not goods and services.

The FTAs contain additional prohibitions on representations made in a specific context. For example, section 12 of the Victorian FTA currently prohibits the making of a false or misleading representation:

• about the production, manufacture, preparation or supply of any goods;
• which is unnecessary for the reasonable care and maintenance of any goods; or
• that is false, misleading or deceptive in any material particular.101

Section 12 of the Victorian FTA also covers false or misleading representations made in a broader range of situations by applying to representations in connection with advertisements about the supply or possible supply of goods and services.

Likewise, section 44 of the NSW FTA contains additional prohibitions to those currently contained in section 53 of the TPA, namely:

• false representations related to obligations and rights under residential tenancy for a moveable dwelling;
• false representations in relation to a person’s rights or obligations under a retirement village contract; and

101 See sections 12(l)-(n) of the Victorian FTA.
• false representations in relation to a person’s rights or obligations under a holiday occupation agreement.

Suggested changes to the range of prohibitions in relation to false and misleading representations could include:

• false or misleading representations concerning claims of discounted goods;

• false or misleading representations concerning the availability of refunds or unqualified claims that no refunds are given;

• false or misleading representations concerning ‘closing down’ sales; and

• false or misleading representations concerning claims that items are on sale.

Question

Bearing in mind the principle that the Australian Consumer Law should apply to transactions in any sector of the economy, is there a need to augment the current scope of sections 53, 53A and 53B of the TPA with regard to the approaches outlined above?

Is the scope of sections 53, 53A and 53B of the TPA sufficiently broad to cover these issues?

Asserting a right to payment for unsolicited goods or services or for making entry in directory (false billing)

False billing practices usually involve individuals and businesses receiving letters or calls requesting payment for goods and services that have never been ordered. A common practice is to seek urgent payment from businesses for advertisements that are claimed to be due to appear in local business directories, on websites or as part of ‘official’ government publications.

The approach used in the TPA

Section 64 of the TPA prohibits a corporation from asserting a right to payment:

• from a person for unsolicited goods or services unless the corporation has reasonable cause to believe that there is a right to that payment; or

• from any person for the making in a directory of an entry relating to the person or to his or her profession, business, trade or occupation unless the corporation knows or has reasonable cause to believe that the person has authorized the making of the entry.

Examples of the types of unsolicited goods or services covered by section 64 of the TPA include the following practices:

• sending consumers goods which were not ordered and then demanding payment;

102 ‘Directory’ includes any publication of a similar nature to a directory but does not include a newspaper published in good faith as a newspaper at regular intervals or a publication published, or to be published, by or under the authority of the Australian Telecommunications Commission.
• tradespeople and repairers doing unrequested work and then demanding payment from the occupier; and

• promoters of directories sending invoices to companies for directory entries which had never been authorised, including fake invoices.

Under section 64 of the TPA, a corporation is deemed to have asserted a right to a payment from a person for unsolicited goods or services, or to a charge for the making of an entry in a directory, if the corporation:

• makes a demand for the payment or asserts a present or prospective right to the payment;

• threatens to bring any legal proceedings with a view to obtaining the payment;

• places or causes to be placed the name of the person on a list of defaulters or debtors, or threatens to do so, with a view to obtaining the payment;

• invokes or causes to be invoked any other collection procedure, or threatens to do so, with a view to obtaining the payment; or

• sends any invoice or other document stating the amount of the payment or setting out the price of the goods or services or the charge for the making of the entry and not stating as prominently (or more prominently) that no claim is made to the payment, or to payment of the price or charge, as the case may be.

Section 64 of the TPA requires written authorisation signed by the person from whom payment is sought as proof that they requested the making of an entry in a directory. In the absence of such authorisation, a person who honours a request for payment for making a directory entry is entitled to recover that payment despite not having authorised that entry. The requirement for written instruction is aimed at preventing false billers from claiming payment on the basis of an alleged verbal authorisation for an advertisement, an allegation that can be hard to disprove.

State and territory approaches

The requirements in sections 64 and 65 of the TPA are reproduced to some extent in state and territory laws.103 Section 59 of the NSW FTA and section 25 of the Victorian FTA provide that a person who receives unsolicited goods pay for those goods or for any loss or damage caused to the goods other than that resulting from a wilful and unlawful act done by the recipient if the goods remain in their possession for:

• three months from the day on which the goods were supplied to the person; or

• one month from the day on which the person notifies the supplier in writing that the goods are unsolicited and must be collected.

There is otherwise a substantial difference to the current approach in the TPA, particularly in the Victorian FTA. For example, the Victorian FTA makes particular provision for unsolicited services. Section 27 of the Victorian FTA, which addresses the right to payment for unauthorised advertisements as well as entries, imposes more detailed requirements for any written authorisation obtained from a person. For example, this authorisation must include:

103 Section 65 of the TPA is similar to section 25 of the Victorian FTA and section 59 of the NSW FTA.

- the name of the publication, the area of circulation, and total number of copies circulated;
- the name and business address of the publisher and the person on whose behalf the publication is published;
- the particulars of the entry;
- the dates on which the entry is to appear, and
- the charge for entry.

In 2006, NSW adopted new provisions in its FTA, designed to strengthen controls on false billing. The amendments drew on the approaches of the Victorian and Queensland FTAs, notably:

- the prohibition on demanding payment for publishing an advertisement without written authority (with certain exceptions for newspapers and other large publications); and
- the provision that a person shall be taken to be demanding payment for unsolicited goods or services or a directory entry if they send a document stating the price, unless the document contains a prominent statement saying ‘THIS IS NOT A BILL. YOU ARE NOT REQUIRED TO PAY ANY MONEY.’

This latter requirement clarifies whether a false biller actually intended to demand money, as the absence of the prescribed statement will be taken as proof of that intention.

Both the NSW and the Victorian FTAs provide for exemptions to this requirement for publishers that could never realistically be regarded as scammers. Section 27(5) of the Victorian FTA therefore does not apply to a publication which is published by:

- a large proprietary company;
- a subsidiary of such a company or a listed corporation or a subsidiary of such a corporation;
- the publisher of any publication which has an audited circulation of 10,000 copies or more per week, or a person which is a related body corporate to such a person;
- a servant of the Crown, a body corporate which represents the Crown or a Council; or
- any other prescribed person, where the person has not been found guilty of an offence under section 24.

105 See section 58A NSW FTA.
106 See section 52(5A) Qld FTA, which prescribes a warning statement to be included on any solicitations for payment. This warning statement was adopted within section 58A NSW FTA.

Questions

Is section 64 of the TPA effective in its current form?

How could it be improved for inclusion in the Australian Consumer Law by reference to existing state and territory approaches or otherwise?

Approving or banning third-party trading schemes

A third party trading scheme is where a consumer acquires goods or services and as a result becomes entitled to goods or services from a third party. Schemes involving the accumulation and redemption of points as a consequence of the use of credit or store cards can be forms of third party trading schemes. The ability to ban such schemes is an expansion of restrictions on ‘trading stamps’ which have existed in state and territory laws for many years.

Part II, Division 4 of the WA FTA and Part 9 of the SA FTA allow the Minister either to prohibit or approve upon application any third-party trading scheme. The criterion for prohibition in the WA legislation is that a ‘scheme is not genuine and reasonable or is contrary to the interests of consumers’. SA recently banned a third-party trading scheme due to extremely long waits for redemptions and the use of complicated conditions that had to be satisfied in order for the customer to receive the goods. 107 Part 5A of the NSW FTA retains a differently worded prohibition on certain ‘trading stamp schemes and similar schemes’.

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision regulating third-party trading schemes? If so, should this provision reflect the current regulatory approaches used in state and territory laws and, if so, how?

Mock auctions

Mock auctions posed a significant problem for consumers throughout the 1960s and early 1970s. Mock auctioneers would entice consumers to pay more for goods than their real value, whereby non-genuine bids would be included in an auction process to drive the price up. Generally, mock auctions occur if, during the course of a sale:

- goods are sold for less than the highest bid made by the purchaser, or part of the purchase price is repaid or credited to the purchaser;
- the right to bid for any lot is restricted to persons who have bought or agreed to buy other goods; or
- any articles are given away or offered as gifts.

Sales of goods would not be considered mock auctions if a reduction in price or repayment was on account of a defect being discovered after the highest bid and the auctioneer was unaware of the defect beforehand or damage occurred after the bid.

Nowadays, mock auctions occur rarely and the provisions regulating them are generally considered by state and territory consumer agencies to be inoperative.

Question

Should mock auctions continue to be prohibited?

If so, should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision prohibiting mock auctions? If so, should this provision reflect the current regulatory approaches used in state and territory laws and, if so, how?
Lay-by sales

What are lay-by sales?

Lay-by sales are provided by retailers in all States and Territories. Lay-by sales involve an agreement between the consumer and the supplier to purchase goods and pay for them by instalments over an agreed period of time before taking delivery. A lay-by sale is the supply of goods on terms that provide:

- the goods will not be delivered to the consumer until the whole of the price has been paid; and
- the price is required or allowed to be paid by three or more instalments (for this purpose the deposit is considered an instalment).

Lay-by is particularly attractive to low-income consumers who may have difficulty in obtaining credit. It may also be an attractive purchasing option to general consumers who have already reached their credit limits or who want to buy an expensive good without needing to save the entire amount prior to committing to its purchase.

Existing state and territory laws

The FTAs of New South Wales and Victoria and the ACT’s Lay-by Sales Agreements Act 1963 have specific provisions for lay-by sales, which provide for:

- legislated requirements for terms and conditions, such as statement of purchase price and deposit paid, dates on which instalments are due, the balance outstanding, and cancellation charges;

- a procedure for cancellation by supplier and consumer;

- the effect of cancellation; and

- cancellation charges.

The remaining States and Territories publish guidelines for consumers and suppliers, which are based on their respective Sale of Goods Acts, the common law, or catch-all provisions in their FTAs.

The supplier may cancel the lay-by if the consumer breaches a term of the lay-by. 108 The Consumer Advocacy and Financial Counselling Association of Victoria (Inc.) (CAFCA) noted in its 1994 report into lay-by sales that the ACT Consumer Affairs Bureau suggested ‘that many traders have been in breach of the Act only because of their inability to understand its provisions’. Given the complexity of the legislation, this does not seem improbable. CAFCA (1994) Why Lay-by? Appendix p 8.
Questions

Do businesses operating across Australia use different terms and conditions for lay-by sales depending on whether there is regulation? If so, please provide examples of these terms and conditions.

Does the level of complaints about lay-by sales received by such businesses vary across jurisdictions depending on the existence of regulation?

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision regulating lay-by sales? If so, should this provision reflect the current regulatory approaches used in NSW, Victoria and/or the ACT?

Offering gifts and prizes

The TPA and the FTAs include provisions dealing with the issue of offering gifts and prizes. For example, section 43 of the Queensland FTA provides that:

'A person shall not, in trade or commerce, in connection with the supply or possible supply of goods or services or in connection with the promotion by any means of the supply or use of goods or services, offer gifts, prizes or other free items with the intention of not providing them or of not providing them as offered.'

Section 54 of the TPA is in a similar form.

Section 16 of the Victorian FTA includes an additional requirement that a person offering gifts or prizes must provide that gift or prize within a reasonable time of making the offer. This is designed to make it clearer to distinguish a breach of the provision. It also shifts the focus from proving that, at the time of the offer, the person had the intention of either not providing the gift or prize or not providing them as offered, to a requirement of proof of the fact that the gift or prize was not delivered within a reasonable time.

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law modify the existing form of section 54 of the TPA along similar lines to section 16 of the Victorian FTA?

If an approach like that in section 16 of the Victorian FTA were adopted, should a ‘reasonable time’ be defined? If so, what would a reasonable time be?

Suggestions for updating current TPA provisions to take account of market developments or new regulatory approaches

An evidentiary provision regarding representations as to future matters

Section 51A of the TPA imposes certain evidentiary rules in relation to proceedings for unfair practices under Division 1 of Part V of the TPA. It provides that where, without reasonable grounds, a corporation makes a representation with respect to any future matter (including doing, or refusing to do, any act), the representation will be presumed to be misleading. Equivalent provisions also exist in the FTAs.\textsuperscript{109}

The practical effect of section 51A of the TPA is that a corporation will be deemed not to have had reasonable grounds for making a representation with respect to a future matter unless it produces evidence to the contrary. The circumstances surrounding these representations are often matters within the knowledge of the person or corporation making the representation and it is difficult to obtain conclusive proof of dishonesty or recklessness from the surrounding circumstances without an admission of guilt from the defendant.

The provision is intended to assist in establishing that a representation is ‘misleading’ for the purposes of sections 52 and 53 of the TPA. However, a similar evidentiary presumption is not available in relation to representations that are ‘false’ or ‘deceptive’.\textsuperscript{110}

A suggested addition to the Australian Consumer Law is that the operation of section 51A of the TPA should be extended to cover false and deceptive representations, particularly in the light of the usefulness of section 51A to consumer protection enforcement.

Question

Should the provisions in section 51A of the TPA be extended to include presumptions in relation to ‘false’, ‘misleading’ or ‘deceptive’ representations for inclusion in the Australian Consumer Law?

It is also suggested that the relationship between section 51A and the accessorial liability provisions of the TPA (such as sections 75B or 80(1)) could be clarified in the Australian Consumer Law. For example, the decisions of the Federal Court in Quinlivan v ACCC\textsuperscript{111} and ACCC v Universal Sports Challenge Pty Ltd\textsuperscript{112} held that the deeming provision in section 51A does not apply to a person who claimed to be an accessory under section 75B of the TPA. However, the decision in ACCC v Global Prepaid Communications Pty Ltd\textsuperscript{113} should also be noted, as the Court found that, unlike for natural persons, there is an argument available that the liability of the corporation should be decided in accordance with section 51A for all purposes, including assessment of accessorial liability.

Question

Should the provisions of section 51A of the TPA be amended to further clarify their relationship with the accessorial liability provisions of the TPA?

Pyramid selling

The existing approach in the TPA

Division 1AAA of Part V of the TPA defines and prohibits (in section 65AAC) practices generally known as ‘pyramid selling’ and section 75AZO of the TPA creates an equivalent criminal offence. Pyramid selling schemes are where a person makes a payment on joining the scheme and, in doing so, is induced to join the scheme (at least in part) on the basis that if they successfully introduce a new member to the scheme, then they will receive a payment.

A pyramid selling scheme under the TPA provisions requires a ‘participation payment’ by a new participant to another participant in the scheme, which is entirely or substantially induced by the prospect of a ‘recruitment payment’ for introducing further participants (a ‘recruitment payment’ being ‘a payment in relation to the introduction to the scheme of further new participants’).

In defining a ‘pyramid selling scheme’ the TPA provides that one should have two characteristics:114

114  Section 65AAD(1) of the TPA.

The Victorian approach to pyramid schemes

A suggested change to the approach in the TPA could be to use the approach in the Victorian FTA, which could address concerns about specific schemes characterised as ‘multi-level marketing schemes’, but which may also bear many of the hallmarks of pyramid selling schemes.

A key issue with legislation prohibiting pyramid selling schemes is how it distinguishes legitimate multi-level marketing schemes (LMLMS) from illegitimate pyramid selling schemes. The purpose of a LMLMS is the sale of a good or service, with recruitment payments simply being the incentive to attract more sellers into the scheme to sell more products. The purpose of a pyramid selling scheme is to get more people into the scheme to maximise recruitment payments.

Section 22 of the Victorian FTA provides that a person must not establish, promote or take any part in a pyramid selling scheme or induce another person to do so. In doing so, the Victorian FTA adopts a different definition of a ‘pyramid selling scheme’. A pyramid selling scheme under the Victorian provisions requires:

• a person to make a payment to participate in a scheme;
• that person to receive a payment for:
  – inducing or enabling another person to participate in the scheme; or
- assisting or enabling participants to be promoted within the scheme; or
- providing participants with or enabling them to be provided with training, facilities or other services; and

- goods or services supplied under the scheme bear no reasonable relationship to their value.

Section 22 of the Victorian FTA also provides that specific schemes may be exempted from the provision by the Governor-in-Council.

Issues with the current approach in the TPA

In raising this issue, some States and Territories have noted a number of concerns about the current approach in the TPA:

- by defining a recruitment payment as a payment in relation to the introduction to the scheme of further new participants, the TPA may be said to cast the net too widely and capture LMLMS, which are legitimate schemes under case law. A proposed alternative would be that ‘in relation to’ should be replaced with ‘for’. However, the corollary of this may be to enable pyramid scheme operators to convince courts that they come within the LMLMS exemption.

- the TPA provisions centre on the requirement that the participation payment be entirely or substantially induced by the prospect that the payer will receive recruitment payments. The burden of proving beyond reasonable doubt (that is, to the criminal standard of proof) that participation payments fall within this definition has, in practice, proved very onerous for those prosecuting pyramid scheme operators. That is, many pyramid schemes involve a recruitment payment plus some other inducement (for example, cheaper telephone charges, investment advice, website construction kits or some other incidental product intended to give the impression that they are LMLMS). Hence, if the defendant leads evidence that participants made their participation payments largely because of the prospect of receiving these inducements, with the prospect of recruitment payments being an insubstantial or incidental matter, it is very hard to disprove this, particularly to the criminal standard of proof.

The Victorian provisions approach the issue of these other inducements differently:

- they require the existence of a participation payment and a recruitment payment to constitute a pyramid selling scheme, without any nexus such as that the participation payment be entirely or substantially induced by the prospect of a recruitment payment; and

- they exclude a scheme involving a payment for goods or services if the payment bears a reasonable relationship to the value of the product (which is the definition of an LMLMS in Victoria).

In addition, the Victorian Magistrates Court Act 1989 places the onus of proof on defendants who wish to rely on an exception, such as the LMLMS exception, to adduce evidence that ‘suggests a reasonable possibility of the existence of facts that, if they existed, would establish the exception.’ This is not a very high evidentiary burden to overcome, but relieves the prosecution from having to bear the entire burden of proof and ensures that a defendant must be required to produce some evidence that they are a legitimate LMLMS.

The TPA provisions attempt to provide for the concept of ‘reasonable relationship’ by allowing the court, in deciding whether a participation payment is entirely or substantially induced by the prospect of a recruitment payment, to have regard to the extent to which the participation payment bears a reasonable relationship to the value of the product that participants are entitled to under the scheme. However, this is currently a discretionary consideration.

Example: Australian Communications Network Pty Ltd v ACCC (2006)

The ACCC was ultimately unsuccessful in showing that the marketing scheme in Australian Communications Network Pty Ltd v Australian Competition and Consumer Commission115, was a pyramid selling scheme for the sale of retail telecommunications services.

The Full Federal Court found that multi-level marketing was a key element of ACN’s business. Participants, called ‘Independent Representatives’, were paid commissions on the billings paid by customers that they had signed up. The Independent Representatives also received a commission on the billings of customers signed up by other Representatives, who had been recruited by the Independent Representatives (known as ‘Downstream Independent Representatives’).

The payments received by Independent Representatives were not solely based on the recruitment of Downstream Independent Representatives, and there had to be a billing to a customer for the acquisition and use of the telecommunications services. Accordingly, ACN’s scheme was found not to be a pyramid selling scheme as there was a genuine underlying economic activity, in the form of the sale of the telecommunications services.

Question

Are the current pyramid selling provisions in the TPA effective? How could they be improved?

Accepting payment without intending to supply

Section 58 of the TPA provides that it is an offence for a corporation, in trade and commerce, to:

- accept payment for goods or services it does not intend to supply;
- accept payment for one kind of good or service when the corporation intends to supply something different; and

• accept payment for goods or services when there are reasonable grounds, of which the corporation ought to be aware, that it will not be able to supply the goods or services paid for either within the period specified, or if no period was specified, within a reasonable time.

Section 19 of the Victorian FTA takes a strict liability approach to this issue. Rather than applying to intended failures to supply, which focus on what a corporation was thinking or knew at the time it accepted payment for goods or services, the Victorian FTA focuses on actual failures to supply or on the actual supply of materially different goods or services within the period of time specified by the supplier or within a ‘reasonable’ time. 116

Question

Should the claimant in an action relating to accepting payment without intending to supply be required only to prove that the supplier failed to supply the goods after accepting payment?

Should a maximum limit be imposed on the amount or percentage of the purchase price that may be taken as a deposit for goods that have been ordered, but not yet delivered?

Dual pricing

State and territory approaches

Section 40 of the NSW FTA117 provides that a supplier should not sell goods to which more than one price is appended at a price that is greater than the lower or lowest of the prices. A price for these purposes is ‘attached’ when it:

• is a price annexed or affixed to, or printed, stamped or otherwise located on the goods;

• appears on a display or stand for the goods;

• is encoded on the goods;

• is published in any catalogue available to the public (unless the catalogue can reasonably be regarded as out of date); or

• in any other way represented as a price applicable to the goods.

Under section 40 of the NSW FTA, where a consumer has picked an item bearing two prices, it is an offence for the trader to sell it at the higher price. The aim is to deter traders from misleading consumers into purchasing goods at a price higher than the lowest marked price. Conversely, if the trader does not want to sell it at the lower price, they have the right to withdraw it from sale altogether. This protects traders from loss due to error (where an incorrect price has inadvertently been displayed) or attempted fraud, for example, where a 117 The ACT has a substantially similar provision which also includes a defence of accident where all reasonable precautions are taken.

price label from a cheaper product has been placed onto a higher value product by a consumer.

Section 40 of the NSW FTA is mainly enforced in relation to supermarket barcode scanning. The Voluntary Code of Practice for Computerised Checkout Systems\textsuperscript{118}, administered by the Australian Retailers Association, reinforces the dual pricing provision. It clearly spells out retailers’ obligations in this area and applies to a significant range of supermarkets and food stores.

Dual-priced goods may not necessarily have more than one price marked directly on them. The provision covers a broad range of pricing methods, including labels, shelves, displays, catalogues and encoding, for example, in a barcode, computer or cash register.

A recent review\textsuperscript{119} noted that the NSW dual pricing provisions appear to function effectively and that, in any case, the NSW Office of Fair Trading receives few complaints on this subject. Submissions made to the review did not raise any concerns about the effectiveness of the provision. It was also noted that the provision does not appear to have had any impact on competition, since it applies to all NSW retailers. Nor does the provision appear to impose any unwarranted costs on traders, given that it is a matter of good business practice to ensure that products and coding systems are accurate. By contrast, incorrect pricing would increase the level of customer complaints a trader receives, thereby increasing complaint handling costs.

The current position under the TPA

The TPA does not contain a provision equivalent to section 40 of the NSW FTA and dual pricing is not, of itself, a contravention of the TPA. However, court decisions have found that the representation of a previous price needs to be accurate and it needs to have been a true price for a reasonable amount of time.\textsuperscript{120}

Question

Is there a need to introduce a specific provision into the Australian Consumer Law to provide that a supplier must not sell goods to which more than one price is appended at a price that is greater than the lower or lowest of the prices?

Provisions relating to mandatory disclosure

Effective information disclosure plays an essential role in enabling consumers to make informed decisions about goods or services. Mandatory information disclosure is intended to mitigate information asymmetries facing consumers when purchasing goods and services. In doing this, it also serves to improve consumer confidence and fair competition.

\textsuperscript{118} See www.retail.org.au.

\textsuperscript{120} See for example Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Prouds Jewellers Pty Ltd [2008] FCA 75 (15 February 2008) and Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Ascot Four Pty Ltd [2008] FCA 1295 (21 August 2008).
The FTAs already make provision for disclosure of certain information in specific types of transactions (such as door-to-door sales and telephone sales) and, in the case of the Victorian FTA, the need for such information to be set out clearly and comprehensibly. In addition to mandatory information standards, there are also voluntary standards that apply in specific sectors.

The Victorian FTA includes a range of provisions which could be considered as the basis for a nationally consistent approach to mandatory information disclosure. These are:

- the requirement for consumer documents to be clear\textsuperscript{121};
- the requirement for a business to include its address in a consumer document\textsuperscript{122}; and
- the requirement to provide receipts for itemised bills.\textsuperscript{123}

These provisions are set out in Attachment D.

An additional factor to be taken into account is the potential for information ‘layering’, which is providing key information at specific times in the life of a transaction. For example, in an online transaction the vendor may show the cumulative price of a basket of goods and then disclose any taxes payable close to the end of the transaction. National consistency in this area could simplify compliance for businesses and ensure consumers are adequately and appropriately informed about key aspects of the transaction at the most appropriate time.

Clarity in consumer documents

Section 163 of the Victorian FTA provides that certain consumer documents (principally contracts) are required to adhere to certain standards. These include:

- being easily legible;
- if printed or typed, being in a minimum of a 10 point font; and
- being clearly expressed.

Similarly, the Corporations Act 2001 (Cth) also contains clarity requirements in relation to specific types of documents, including offer documents (section 1019I), disclosure documents (section 715A), Financial Services Guides (section 942C) and Product Disclosure Statements (section 1013C). In those and certain other sections, identical wording is used to require that specified documents ‘must be worded and presented in a clear, concise and effective manner’, although they do not require the use of specific font sizes.

In Matrix Pilates\textsuperscript{124}, a decision in relation to section 163 of the Victorian FTA, the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT) held that while particular terms were not ‘particularly difficult to read’, they were nonetheless ‘ambiguously expressed, or expressed in a way which disguises their true effect’ and, therefore, in breach of the section. VCAT also

Section 29 of the Victorian FTA requires that a supplier must provide the name and physical address of the person publishing a document, statement or advertisement in respect of the actual or potential supply of goods or services. In addition, if the business is licensed or registered, then the relevant registration number should be provided.\footnote{Section 29 of the Victorian FTA does not apply in relation to the supply of prostitution services, as defined under the \textit{Prostitution Control Act 1994 (Vic)}.}

Section 23 of the Tasmanian FTA requires statements intended or likely to promote the supply of goods or services, which include a reference to a private box number, to include the name and address of the place of business or residence of the person by whom the private box number is rented or was obtained. In the other States and Territories, the requirement tends to arise in the context of the regulation of specific practices, such as door-to-door sales.\textsuperscript{128}

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision relating to the disclosure of a supplier’s address in documents, statements or advertisements?

Providing receipts for itemised bills

Section 161A of the Victorian FTA allows a purchaser to whom services have been supplied to request an itemised bill within 30 days after receipt of a bill or account from the supplier. If the account relates to a contract for goods or services up to $50 in value, a purchaser to whom the goods or services were supplied may also request proof of transaction.\textsuperscript{129}

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision relating to the provision of an itemised bill on request?

Requirement to return replaced parts

The TPA does not require a supplier to return removed parts where they are being repaired or maintained.

A suggested addition to the Australian Consumer Law is the inclusion of a new provision based on section 162 of the Victorian FTA. Section 162 provides that a person who permanently removes a part from goods which he or she is repairing or maintaining in trade or commerce (whether or not he or she also replaces the part):

- must offer to return the removed part at or before the return of the goods; and
- must return the removed part, if the owner asks for the part to be returned, within a reasonable time of the return of the goods to the owner.

This requirement does not apply if no charge is imposed for removing the part or for replacing and fitting the part.

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law include a provision requiring a supplier to return replaced parts along the lines of section 162 of the Victorian FTA?

\textsuperscript{128} For example, section 40J NSW FTA, which requires a door-to-door dealer to identify themselves, including their address (not being a postal box).

\textsuperscript{129} In contrast, accounts exceeding $50 in value must be accompanied by proof of the transaction. See section 161A(4) Victorian FTA.
Liability of recipient of unsolicited services

At present, section 65 of the TPA provides for liability of a recipient of unsolicited goods, but not services. Section 26 of the Victorian FTA extends this provision to services;\textsuperscript{130}

‘A person to whom unsolicited services are supplied by another person, in trade or commerce, is not liable to make any payment for the services and is not liable for loss or damage as a result of the supply of the services.’

Question

Should the Australian Consumer Law extend the current application of section 65 of the TPA to services?

Part IV
Implementation and review
CHAPTER 12
IMPLEMENTING THE NATIONAL CONSUMER LAW

The establishment and modification of the Australian Consumer Law

The Australian Consumer Law is to be supported by an Inter-Governmental Agreement between the Australian Government and the governments of the States and Territories. This will set out the various administrative mechanisms for the implementation and ongoing maintenance of the Australian Consumer Law.

In the first instance, the initial text of the Australian Consumer Law will be agreed by the Australian Government and the governments of the States and Territories and approved by COAG. It has been agreed that this process will be completed by 30 June 2010.

Subsequently, the generic consumer protections covered in the Australian Consumer Law may require modification or augmentation. The process for the agreement of such changes was proposed by MCCA at its 15 August 2008 meeting and ratified by COAG on 2 October 2008. MCCA agreed that this process would be set out in the Inter-Governmental Agreement and would require amendments to the Australian Consumer Law to be agreed by the Australian Government plus four governments of the States and Territories, of which three must be States.

Enforcement arrangements

The implementation of the Australian Consumer Law will require changes to the interactions between consumer law enforcement agencies in each Australian jurisdiction. While each jurisdiction will retain a role in the enforcement of generic consumer protections, the introduction of national consistency in laws will increase the need to ensure that investigation and enforcement actions are coordinated by national, state and territory enforcement agencies. To this end, enforcement agencies will develop formal agreements that cover arrangements for communication between them and the coordination of their activities. These arrangements will harmonise and improve upon the cooperation mechanisms already in place between enforcement agencies.

In some cases, enforcement agencies will be also required to develop consistent national guidance for businesses and consumers on specific issues. In its detailed proposals, MCCA agreed that enforcement agencies would develop national guidance on the enforcement of the new unfair contract terms provisions, in accordance with a process set out in the Inter-Governmental Agreement.
REVIEW OF ENFORCEMENT POWERS

In its review of Australia’s consumer policy framework, the PC recommended that the new enforcement powers be reviewed, with explicit consideration of the benefits and costs of moving to a single national regulator model for all of the law, having regard to:

• any evidence that differing enforcement practices or regulatory ‘break-out’ are leading to divergent outcomes for consumers and businesses across Australia;

• experiences and outcomes in any jurisdictions that have referred their powers of enforcement for the new national generic consumer law to the Australian Government; and

• the implications of any shifts in enforcement responsibility for industry specific consumer policy to the national level.131

In its detailed proposals, MCCA agreed that such a review should take place after seven years.

JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ — MINISTERIAL COUNCIL ON CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Friday 15 August 2008

The Ministerial Council on Consumer Affairs (MCCA) held its twentieth meeting in Hobart today. MCCA comprises Commonwealth, State, Territory and New Zealand Ministers responsible for fair trading, consumer protection laws, trade measurement and credit laws.

Members of the Council are:

Hon David Llewellyn MHA (Chair, Tasmania)
Hon Chris Bowen MP (Commonwealth)
Hon Tony Robinson MP (Victoria)
Hon Linda Burney MP (New South Wales)
Hon Kerry Shine MP (Queensland)
Western Australia (in caretaker mode)
Hon Gail Gago MLC (South Australia)
Mr Simon Corbell MLA (Australian Capital Territory)
Dr Chris Burns MLA (Northern Territory)
Hon Judith Tizard MP (New Zealand)

Apologies were received from Dr Chris Burns MLA, Mr Simon Corbell MLA, the Hon Sheila McHale MLA and the Hon Judith Tizard MP.

MCCA’s objective

MCCA’s objective is to provide the best and most consistent protection for Australian consumers through its consideration of consumer affairs and fair trading issues of national significance and, where possible, development of consistent approaches to those issues.

MCCA’s principal strategies

To achieve this objective, MCCA’s principal strategies are to facilitate and encourage:

1. nationally coordinated and consistent policy development and implementation by all jurisdictions, including legislative consistency of major elements of consumer protection law and emerging policy issues (Policy and Legislative Harmonisation);

2. consistency of policy and enforcement decisions for the suppliers of goods and services within a national marketplace (Consistent Enforcement);

3. access to education and information for consumers and suppliers (Education);
4. co-operation and consultation on consumer policy between Australia and New Zealand (Australia/NZ Co-operation); and

5. research into consumer concerns and trade practices (Research).

MCCA is supported by a Standing Committee of Officials of Consumer Affairs (SCOCA).

MCCA considered a range of consumer issues in the context of these strategies. Outcomes of the meeting included:

Enhancing Australia’s Consumer policy Framework: Reform Proposals

Today the Ministerial Council on Consumer Affairs (MCCA) agreed a series of proposals for far-reaching consumer policy reform. In doing so, the Ministerial Council responded to the Council of Australian Government’s (COAG) request that the Business Regulation and Competition Working Group (BRCWG), in cooperation with MCCA, develop enhanced national approaches for Australia’s consumer policy framework, drawing on the final report of the Productivity Commission (PC).

MCCA has taken this opportunity to build on its high-level commitments made in May 2008 and reach in-principle agreement on a range of policy initiatives designed to provide greater national consistency in Australia’s consumer laws, their enforcement and the way in which those laws are developed. This represents a cooperative approach by the States and Territories to work with the Commonwealth to develop national reforms. The PC estimated that taking these steps could result in benefits to Australian consumers of between $1.5 billion and $4.5 billion a year.

In proposing these reforms, MCCA recognises that while Australia’s current consumer policy framework has strengths, it is in need of significant improvements to overcome existing inconsistencies, gaps and duplication in Australia’s consumer legislation and its enforcement. Australian consumers can benefit from consistent national coverage by a uniform national consumer law, and by coordinated enforcement action, providing them greater confidence in Australia’s product and service markets. In this way, Australian governments can build on the structural market reforms of the past 15 years, to better enable consumers to drive competitive, efficient and well-functioning markets in future.

In agreeing to these proposals, MCCA seeks to build on its earlier agreement to introduce a new national product safety regulation and enforcement system, which was confirmed by COAG at its 3 July 2008 meeting, and also the agreement of the State and Territories to transfer their responsibilities for the regulation of consumer credit to the Commonwealth. The development of increasingly national consumer product and service markets means that Australian consumers will benefit from uniform national consumer policy, legislative and enforcement frameworks.

The Ministerial Council proposes that COAG consider the following reform proposals, which would form the basis of an enhanced consumer policy framework for Australia to be agreed by COAG at its 2 October 2008 meeting. These policy proposals have been developed through a process led by the Commonwealth, in which the States and Territories have been actively involved.
A national consumer policy objective

Effective national consumer policy requires common adherence by the Commonwealth, the States and the Territories to a single national objective. With this in mind, the Ministerial Council proposes that all Australian governments should agree to a common, overarching objective for consumer policy based on the Productivity Commission’s proposed objective:

‘To improve consumer wellbeing through consumer empowerment and protection, fostering effective competition and enabling the confident participation of consumers in markets in which both consumers and suppliers trade fairly.’

Ministers further propose that this overarching objective should be supported by six operational objectives for consumer policy:

- to ensure that consumers are sufficiently well-informed to benefit from and stimulate effective competition;
- to ensure that goods and services are safe and fit for the purposes for which they were sold;
- to prevent practices that are unfair;
- to meet the needs of those consumers who are most vulnerable or are at the greatest disadvantage;
- to provide accessible and timely redress where consumer detriment has occurred; and
- to promote proportionate, risk-based enforcement.

A national consumer law

The keystone of the proposed enhanced national consumer policy framework is a single national consumer law, which represents best practice regulation. A single national consumer law will enhance individual consumer well-being, further assist in the development of a single national economy, reduce burdens on business and facilitate well-functioning markets, to the benefit of all Australian consumers and businesses.

The Ministerial Council proposes that all Australian governments should agree to adopt a new national consumer law, which operates in all Australian jurisdictions and which remains consistent. This law should be based on the current consumer protection provisions of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (TPA) and also incorporate appropriate amendments reflecting best practice in state and territory legislation.

The Ministerial Council further proposes that:

- the new national consumer law should be developed by the agreement of all Australian governments and made law through an application legislation scheme, with the Commonwealth as the lead legislator and the States and Territories applying the new national consumer law (as amended from time to time) as part of their own laws;

- national consumer law provisions should apply to all sectors of the economy. However, Ministers also recognise that existing constitutional issues may mean that the financial services sector will need to retain a distinct legislative framework. In this regard,
Ministers note the Commonwealth’s position that there should be an ongoing commitment by the Australian Government to consistency between the national consumer law’s provisions and consumer provisions in credit and financial services laws, to the extent that it is practicable to do so; and

- amendments to the national consumer law must be agreed by governments according to an Inter-Governmental Agreement, which will provide, among other things, for the amendments to be agreed by the Commonwealth plus four state and territory governments, of which three must be states, noting that these arrangements will require endorsement by COAG on 2 October 2008.

Unfair contract terms

As part of the proposed national consumer law, the Ministerial Council proposes that it should include a provision that addresses unfair contract terms. The provision should have the following features:

- the term is unfair when it causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations arising under the contract and it is not reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate interests of the supplier;

- a remedy could only be applied where the claimant shows detriment, or a substantial likelihood of detriment, to the consumer (individually or as a class). Detriment is not limited to financial detriment;

- it would relate only to standard form (ie non-negotiated) contracts. Should a supplier allege that the contract at issue is not a standard form contract, then the onus will be on the supplier to prove that it is not;

- it would exclude the upfront price of the good or service, using the approach currently adopted in regulation 6(2) of the United Kingdom’s Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999; and

- it would require all of the circumstances of the contract to be considered, taking into account the broader interests of consumers, as well as the particular consumers affected.

Where these criteria are met, the unfair term would be voided only for the contracts of those consumers or class of consumers subject to detriment (or the substantial likelihood thereof), with suppliers also potentially liable to damages for that detriment, along with other remedies available under the Trade Practices Act 1974.

The drafting of any new provision should ensure the potential for private (and regulator-led) representative actions for damages by a class of consumers detrimentally affected by unfair contract terms, in keeping with the PC’s recommendation that representative actions be improved.

The provision should also permit the prescription of certain terms that are, in all circumstances, considered to be unfair. This regulation making power would rest with the Australian Government Minister, who would prescribe terms in accordance with the national consumer law amendment process set out in the Inter-Governmental Agreement and the requirements of regulatory impact assessment.
The provision should be supported by national guidance on its enforcement, developed by the national and state and territory regulators, in accordance with a process set out in the Inter-Government Agreement.

Transitional arrangements should be put in place after enactment, which would give businesses the time to modify their contracts.\textsuperscript{132}

The operation and effects of the new provision should be reviewed within seven years of its introduction.

\textbf{Enforcement of the national consumer law}

In implementing a new national consumer law, the Ministerial Council recognises the importance of ensuring that enforcement arrangements can address the needs of all Australian consumers effectively, including the most vulnerable and disadvantaged. In this respect, Ministers are mindful of the findings of the PC, which concluded that current enforcement arrangements could be greatly enhanced.

To this end, Ministers propose that:

- enforcement of the national consumer law will be shared between the ACCC and the state and territory offices of fair trading, supported by formal agreements between these enforcement bodies that cover arrangements for communication between them and the coordination of their activities;

- at the Commonwealth level, ASIC will have primary responsibility for the enforcement of consumer laws relating to financial services, and the States and Territories will retain their enforcement powers in this area, and ASIC will assume primary responsibility for enforcing national consumer credit laws; and

- all enforcement arrangements should be reviewed by COAG within seven years after the commencement of the new national consumer law.

The Ministerial Council also proposes that enforcement and redress powers for regulators should be enhanced under the national consumer law, as recommended by the PC and as previously agreed by the Ministerial Council, through the inclusion of civil pecuniary penalties, disqualification orders, substantiation notices and public warning powers and infringement notices (to the extent permitted by relevant Commonwealth and state and territory laws and policies). Consumer regulators should also be able to take representative actions on behalf of consumers not party to court proceedings and have the power to gather evidence until substantive proceedings have commenced.

Ministers recognise the need for consistent and timely national information as a basis for improving the general understanding of existing and developing consumer policy issues. To this end, the Ministerial Council proposes that the consumer regulators should be required to report annually to it, in a nationally consistent manner, on common enforcement issues, or consumer issues arising from their enforcement activities.

\textsuperscript{132} Consideration of the interaction of an unfair contract terms provision and industry-specific measures, such as the \textit{Telecommunications (Standard Form of Agreement Information) Determination 1999}, will need to be taken into account during the consultation and development stages of this reform.
The Ministerial Council recognises that consumer law enforcement bodies need to share information in order to provide comprehensive enforcement coverage. To this end, it proposes that all Australian consumer regulators consistently participate in the AUZSHARE complaints database.

Consumer information

The Ministerial Council also recognises that consumers must access a range of consumer law enforcement bodies and other bodies providing consumer assistance and advice. In keeping with the PC’s recommendation, the Ministerial Council also proposes that the Commonwealth would work in consultation with state and territory governments to develop an enhanced national web-based information tool for guiding consumers to the appropriate dispute resolution body, as well as providing other consumer information. It should be subject to consumer testing to ensure that it is easy to use and has the appropriate content.

Consumer research and advocacy

Ministers recognise the importance of evidence-based policy, supported by robust research and effective stakeholder advocacy. To this end, Ministers propose that the Commonwealth will work with the States and Territories to further develop the effectiveness of consumer representation and consumer policy research nationally.

Review of sector specific laws

The Ministerial Council notes the Productivity Commission’s recommendation that the BRCWG, in consultation with MCCA, should oversee a process to identify unnecessary or divergent industry-specific consumer regulation with a view to repealing or harmonising it across jurisdictions where beneficial, and that the BRCWG has commenced a process to do this.

Other issues for noting

In making these proposals, the Ministerial Council also notes that a number of other areas of consumer policy are being considered and developed as part of other processes:

- Ministers note that implied warranty and condition laws, including a consideration of ‘lemon’ laws, require review (as agreed by the Council on 23 May 2008), and further note that, as a part of the incorporation of these provisions into the national consumer law, further steps should be taken to educate consumers and business as to their rights and responsibilities by Australian governments.

- Ministers note that the Commonwealth Attorney-General is considering initiatives to improve access to justice for all claimants in Commonwealth courts, including consumers, and agrees that the Commonwealth will work with the States and the Territories to consider enhancements to the procedures of small claims courts and tribunals so as to create greater national consistency for consumer law actions, as well as considering the need for changes to arrangements for class actions in the Federal Court of Australia.

- Ministers note that SCAG is currently considering legal aid policy and funding in the context of COAG’s new framework for Commonwealth-State relations.

- Ministers propose that Australian governments should review the effectiveness and consistency of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) schemes both within and across industry sectors throughout Australia.
Progress on other recommendations

Ministers also propose that COAG should note that:

- the Australian Government is working with the States and Territories to implement a new product safety system in line with COAG’s decision in July 2008 and that this process will be completed by mid-2010; and

- the Ministerial Council’s National Education and Information Advisory Taskforce is currently pursuing an evaluation of the effectiveness of publicly available consumer information.

Implementation

Ministers have given preliminary consideration to the issue of implementing these reforms, and have agreed an indicative implementation plan to propose to the BRCWG, with a proposed date for completing the policy development and implementation process by the end of 2011. Ministers recognise that there is a need for much of the detail of these proposals to be further developed as part of the policy development and implementation process and further note that individual jurisdictions are already engaged in discussions to identify the scope of this work.

Update on Consumer Product Safety Reform

MCCA noted that at its meeting on 3 July 2008, the Council of Australian Governments endorsed the model for reform of product safety regulatory arrangements that was recommended by MCCA at its May 2008 meeting. The revised regulatory arrangements will be implemented by mid-2010.

MCCA recognised the significant work undertaken to harmonise existing bans and standards.

National Trade Licensing

Ministers expressed support for a national system of occupational licensing underpinned by cooperative state and territory legislation.

A national licensing system will introduce uniform requirements across Australia and will allow businesses and individuals to move seamlessly between jurisdictions without the need for multiple licences. Some of the first occupations to move to the proposed national system will be electricians, property agents, plumbers and builders.

Ministers noted that the Chair of MCCA would write to the COAG Skills Recognition Steering Committee requesting that it consult with state and territory Consumer Affairs Ministers on the proposed model for national licensing and the Intergovernmental Agreement.

MCCA Governance

Ministers have agreed that they will review the role, function and governance arrangements of the Ministerial Council to ensure the successful delivery of an enhanced national consumer policy framework.
